CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

PART III.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

[From February 23, 1875, to March 3, 1875.]

proviso which was adopted by the Committee of the Whole correcting mistaken constructions in the tariff bill in reference to bolting-cloths, and also in the internal-revenue bill in reference to checks. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the bill, and upon it I demand the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to raise a question of order on that substitute.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of order, and it is that this bill cannot under the rules be put to a vote to-day unless by the concurrence of two-thirds of the House. I insist, therefore, that the bill must go over until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 736) to change the boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of the State of Texas and to fix the times and places of holding courts in the same; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to raise a question of order. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means offers a substitute for the entire bill; and my point of order is that the proposition has not been before the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order that the substitute contains any propositions that have not been discussed and considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BURCHARD. Well, I have not heard the proposition read yet.

Mr. DAWES. I was very careful and guarded in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman would be good if the amendment included any tax which has not had its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURCHARD. This is a new proposition, entirely new, and not an amendment that has been before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the substitute be read.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits thereafter produced in the United States a tax of 90 cents on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, to be paid by the distiller, owner, or person having possession thereof before removal from the distillery bonded warehouse; and so much of section 3251 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as is inconsistent with this act is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 3368 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "20 cents a pound" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "24 cents a pound;" and that section 3394 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "five" wherever it occurs therein and inserting instead thereof the word "six," and by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting instead thereof the word "seventy-five:" Provided, That the increase of tax herein provided for shall not apply to tobacco on which the tax under existing law shall have been paid when this act takes effect.

SEC. 3. That on all molasses, concentrated molasses, tank-bottoms, sirup of sugar or cane juice, melada, and on sugars according to the Dutch standard in color, imported from foreign countries, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties now imposed in Schedule G, section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, an amount equal to 25 per cent. of said duties as levied upon the several articles and grades therein designated: Provided, That concentrated melada or concrete shall hereafter be classed as sugar, dutiable according to color by the Dutch standard, and melada shall be known and defined as an article made in the process of sugar-making, being the cane juice boiled down to the sugar point, and containing all the sugar and molasses resulting from the boiling process, and without any process of purging or clarification; and any and all products of the sugar-cane imported in bags, mats, baskets, or other tight packages shall be considered sugar, and dutiable as such: And provided further, That of the drawback on refined sugars exported allowed by section 3019 of the Revised Statutes of the United States only 1 per cent. of the amount so allowed shall be retained by the United States.

SEC. 4. That so much of section 2503 of the Revised Statutes as provides that only 90 per cent. of the several duties and rates of duty imposed on certain articles therein enumerated by section 2504, shall be levied, collected, and paid, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the several duties and rates of duty prescribed in said section 2504 shall be and remain as by that section levied, without abatement of 10 per cent. as provided in section 2503.

SEC. 5. That the increase of duties provided by this act shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise actually on shipboard and bound to the United States on or before the 10th day of February, 1875, nor on any such goods, wares, or merchandise on deposit in warehouses or public stores at the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1875, shall be construed to impose any duty on bolting-cloths theretofore admitted free of duty; nor to require the use of a stamp upon the receipt in the receipt-book of a savings-bank or institution for savings, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company when money is paid to a depositor on his pass-book.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that everything in my substitute has been actually adopted by the Committee of the Whole except the proposition to tax whisky 90 cents a gallon.

The SPEAKER. That is a less rate than was proposed and considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DAWES. It is.

The SPEAKER. Had it been a higher rate it would not have been in order.

Mr. CESSNA. It was discussed in the Committee of the Whole as a proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER. No matter whether that particular proposition was discussed in Committee of the Whole or not, provided the tax now proposed is less than was considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think this particular proposition was discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That makes no difference.

Mr. BURCHARD. The identical proposition presented in this substitute was not discussed in Committee of the Whole; it would make a bill different entirely from the one which was discussed.

The SPEAKER. The law is this: Whatever has been discussed in Committee of the Whole may be moved anew in the House, or any proposition for a less tax may be moved in the House. It is not in order, however, to move in the House a quantum of tax greater than has been discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURCHARD. The proposition to tax distilled spirits hereafter manufactured 90 cents a gallon was not discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. But there was a proposition discussed to tax it a dollar a gallon.

Mr. BURCHARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And therefore anything below a dollar a gallon would be in order now.

Mr. BURCHARD. That was to tax a portion of distilled spirits, not all; this is a different proposition.

Mr. THOMPSON. This identical proposition was discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It does not matter whether it was or not. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] raises the point of order that under the rule adopted at this session this bill cannot have the previous question called upon it the first day of its discussion and consideration in the House. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to call the previous question upon the substitute which he has proposed for the bill as reported from the Committee of the Whole. The rule applies to the engrossment and third reading of a bill, and the Chair rules that the previous question can be called upon this substitute now, it being in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] to allow me to offer an amendment to strike out section 4 of his substitute.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot do that, and must insist upon my call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAWES and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 125, noes 83.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. BURCHARD. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 114, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Lamport, Lawson, Lewis, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Berry, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crutchfield, Eden, Robert S. Hale, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Hynes, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Lansing, Lofland, McKee, McLean, Mitchell, Nesmith, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Ransier, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, George L. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Jasper D. Ward, Whitehouse, William Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—40.

So the main question was ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute proposed by Mr. DAWES for the bill as reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 27, noes 92.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Duell, Eames, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamport, Lawson, Lewis, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Rainey, Rapier, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—132.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Cannon, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Loughridge, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Phillips, Pratt, Randall, Ray, Read, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Sener, Sherwood, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Walls, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, George Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Caulfield, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Dobbins, Eden, Farwell, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Hays, Hendee, Howe, Hynes, Kendall, Lamison, Lansing, Lofland, McKee, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niles, Pelham, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Ransier, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Sloan, Snyder, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Whitehouse, and William Williams—43.

So the substitute was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. FARWELL said: On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CAULFIELD. If he were here he would vote in the negative, and I should vote in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now renew my point.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time, on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] raises the point of order that it requires a two-thirds vote to second the previous question because this is the first day the bill has been considered in the House.

Mr. DAWES. If that objection be adhered to, I will call the previous question and then move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a suggestion in the way of analysis of the new rule. That rule divides bills into two classes. Upon one class of bills it left dilatory motions still applicable—bills "appropriating the money, the credit, or other property of the United States." Under the classification of that rule, bills are either those upon which there is an absolute right to cut off dilatory motions, or bills which are left exposed to such motions. This bill therefore is either subject to the rule which says that the previous question shall not be seconded upon the engrossment and third reading of a bill on the first day of its consideration in the House, except by a two-thirds vote; or it is liable to dilatory motions. The Chair holds that it is not liable to dilatory motions; and that therefore, this being the first day of its consideration in the House, a two-thirds vote is required to second the demand for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading. The Chair will observe further that this relates merely to the seconding. If two-thirds second the previous question by a viva voce vote or on a count by tellers, a majority can then order the main question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would not insist upon my point but for the fact that I want to make a notable instance of what I regard as the absurdity of this new rule. Therefore I must insist on the point.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Indiana insisting on his point of order, I will demand the previous question, and pending that move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to test whether two-thirds favor his demand or not.

Mr. DAWES. But I will lose control of my bill if I fail.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why not let the minority have the right to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can control the matter by moving to recommit the bill and calling the previous question on it.

Mr. DAWES. I will try the second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to say, in answer to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] that this exhibits the absurdity of the rule, that if it were not for the new rule he and twenty others could prevent legislation on this subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. It prevents us from obtaining any modification of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts on which he demands the previous question. Under the old rule we could delay action till proper amendments were made.

The SPEAKER. It also affects that.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to make a case upon it to impress upon the next House (of which I am not a member) the necessity of abolishing it among the very first things.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but so far as it exists in the present House it gives the majority the right to pass a tax bill, which the gentleman from Indiana could prevent under the old rule.

Mr. DAWES. I will test the seconding of the previous question, as the Chair states I thereby do not lose control of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a question. A few days ago that committee reported through the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] an amendment providing that on tobacco sold previous to the 10th of February, 1875, the increased price should fall upon the buyer and not upon the seller. Is that incorporated in the substitute?

Mr. DAWES. It is not incorporated in the substitute. It did not occur to me. In applying it to whisky hereafter made it was not necessary. I have no objection to admit it if there be no objection, as it applies to tobacco alone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the amendment was adopted, as follows:

And provided further, That whenever it shall be shown by testimony under oath, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that any person liable to pay the increased tax by this act imposed had, prior to the 10th day of February, 1875, made a contract for the future delivery of such tobacco at a fixed price, which contract was in writing prior to that date, such tobacco may be delivered to the contracting party entitled thereto under special permit from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue provided therefor without previous payment of such additional tax; but the said additional tax shall be a lien thereon, and shall be paid by and collected from the purchaser under such contract before the sale or removal thereof by him, and when demanded by the collector of internal revenue for the district to which the same shall be removed for delivery to the purchaser; and any sale or removal by such purchaser, prior to the payment of such tax, shall subject him and the tobacco so sold or removed to all the penalties and processes of law provided in the case of manufacturers of tobacco so selling or removing tobacco to avoid the payment of tax.

Mr. DAWES. I now demand the previous question on the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

Mr. NIBLACK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NIBLACK and Mr. DAWES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 151, noes 67.

So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question next recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 114, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Kasson, Killinger, Lamport, Lawson, Lewis, Lowe, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Rapier, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, White, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Martin, James W. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Randall, Ray, Read, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Sener, Sherwood, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Walls, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Willie, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—114.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Eden, Farwell, Robert S. Hale, Hays, Hendee, Howe, Hynes, Kendall, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowndes, McKee, Mitchell, Nesmith, Nunn, Packard, Pelham, Perry, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Ransier, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, Smart, Snyder, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiteley, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolf—50.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. PERRY stated that he was paired with Mr. BASS, who if present would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE stated that he was paired with Mr. SCOFIELD, who desired to leave the House; and that while he would vote in the negative Mr. SCOFIELD would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PACKARD stated that he was paired with Mr. WOLFE, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative; and also that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, who was confined to his house by sickness, would if present vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STONE stated that Mr. LAMISON, who was necessarily absent, would if present vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill and refer them to the Committee on Appropriations without printing, as they have been already printed by order of the Senate.

I move also to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the post-office and Military Academy appropriation bills, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

I also move that the report of expenditures for the fiscal year 1872, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations to-day, be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the House take a recess, that there may be a session this evening for the consideration of the election bill reported by the Select Committee on Alabama Affairs.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. For debate only.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 89, noes 22.

Mr. COBURN called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 11, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered and the motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLAINE: Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking that the line of land-grant road between Portage City and Stevens Point be changed to the most direct and feasible route, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BUNDY: Petitions of citizens of Lawrence County, Ohio, for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties made in 1872 and against a duty on tea and coffee and revival of internal taxes, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: The petition of citizens of South Carolina, for the incorporation of the Eastern and Western Transportation Company, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. CURTIS: The petition of citizens of Erie, Pennsylvania, for Government aid to the Texas and Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of Dorcas P. Wilkins, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STONE: Resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, praying Congress to pass an act to give pensions to surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, to the same committee.

By Mr. WALLS: The petition of 61 citizens of Jacksonville, Florida, in relation to the Freedman's Savings-Bank, and asking relief for losses sustained by its failure, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. WELLS: Resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of granting pensions to surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of citizens of Lytle City, Iowa, for additional duties on flaxseed and jute-butts, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, with the accompanying engravings, Messrs. ANTHONY, HOWE, and SAULSBURY.

CORRECTION OF AN ENROLLED BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be authorized in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes," to change the word "Linnville" to "Louisville," in the ninth line of the Senate substitute thereof, so that the line will read "the Memphis, Clarkesville and Louisville."

The resolution was concurred in.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present thirty petitions of members of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of New York, signed by a very large number of persons, setting forth the evils of intemperance and asking an amendment to the Constitution which shall prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Finance, that committee having heretofore had charge of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of John N. Miller, of Albion, New York, and of others in his behalf, praying that he may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a preamble and resolutions of the common council of Long Island City, New York, calling upon Congress to grant necessary appropriations for the removal of obstructions to navigation at Hell Gate; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of G. W. Barber and others, citizens of Maine, asking that the importation, manufacture, and sale of alcoholic liquors be prohibited in the Territories of the United States and in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT presented resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the passage of the bill now before Congress equalizing bounties; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Allentown, Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, praying that the aid of the national credit be extended to the completion of a great southern line of railroad to the Pacific; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DAVIS presented a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, in favor of appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio River and its tributaries; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WEST presented a memorial and resolutions of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, in favor of reciprocal trade with Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LOGAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, in favor of the bill for removing obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented a petition of numerous soldiers of the State of Ohio, asking for the passage of the bill for the equalization of bounties; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, in favor of appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio River and its tributaries; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of J. L. Chase and other citizens of Biddeford, Maine, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRATT. I also present a petition of sundry soldiers of the volunteer forces of the United States from the State of Indiana, urging upon Congress the immediate passage of the House bill providing for the equalization of bounties upon the basis of eight and one-third dollars per month, or some other just rate, by the provisions of which the unjust discrimination in reference to bounties under the existing laws may no longer be enforced. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William H. Manning, of Farmington, Iowa, praying compensation for certain timber taken and used by the troops under the order of the authorities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of the owners of the pilot-boats William Bell and James Funk, asking compensation for the loss of the same, destroyed on the high seas by the rebel cruiser Tallahassee, to be paid out of the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the passage of a law granting a pension to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 20, asking Congress to create and establish a United States district court for the Indian Territory.

Be it resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring herein,) That the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled be, and they are hereby, most respectfully requested to pass a law creating and establishing a United States circuit court for the Indian Territory at as early day as possible, and locating the place of holding thereof at as near a point as practicable to said Territory, if not within the same, having in view the procuring of suitable persons for grand and petit jurors, the same to have original criminal jurisdiction of all crimes committed therein, and civil jurisdiction of all matters arising out of transactions between the citizens thereof and between the citizens of said nation and citizens of the United States, with full powers to enforce all orders, judgments, and decrees as is given to courts of the Territories of the United States, and such other powers as the Congress may deem just and best to protect life and property and guarantee the free enjoyment of all legal right in said nation to the citizens thereof and to the citizens of the United States therein.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators be, and hereby are, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best exertions to procure the speedy passage of such a law and the early establishment of such a court.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and hereby is, requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of our Senators and members of Congress.

Adopted by the senate January 28, 1875.

JOHN H. FOLKS,
Secretary.

Concurred in by the house February 3, 1875.

HENRY BOOTH,
Chief Clerk.

I, Tom H. Cavanaugh, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of state.

Done at Topeka this 15th day of February, A. D. 1875.

[L. S.] TOM H. CAVANAUGH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board:

House concurrent resolution No. 35, in favor of deepening the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Whereas the deepening of the mouth of the Mississip pi River so as to admit the passage of vessels of the largest size is a matter of the most vital importance to the producing interests of the entire West; and whereas the plan of deepening that river proposed by Captain Eads has received the support of a large number of practical engineers and seems to be a practicable and feasible method of achieving the ends sought: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to support the passage of a law for the deepening of the mouth of the Mississippi River by way of the Southwest Pass, according to the plan of Captain Eads.

The secretary of state is instructed to send a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Adopted by the house February 6, 1875.

HENRY BOOTH,
Chief Clerk.

Concurred in by the senate February 11, 1875.

JOHN H. FOLKS,
Secretary.

I, Tom H. Cavanaugh, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of state.

Done at Topeka this —— day of February, A. D. 1875.

[L. S.] TOM H. CAVANAUGH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the enactment of a law authorizing a change in the location of the land-grant railroad between Portage City and Lake Superior; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Joseph W. Williams and other citizens of the State of Maine, asking for a prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the Territories and the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties to soldiers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of a large number of insurance companies and underwriters of the city of New York, remonstrating against the proposed abolition of, or any change in, the administration of the present system of the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I present the petition of 48,853 farmers of the Northwest, asking for appropriations by Congress for the improvement of the water-route from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan, via the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. The petition is very brief, and, as it is so numerously signed, Senators will bear with me a few moments while I read it in full:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas cheaper and more ample means of transportation are imperatively necessary to the development and prosperity of the Western States; and whereas the report of the Select Committee on Transportation recently submitted to the United States Senate demonstrates the fact that the adequate improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin water-route, from the Mississippi River to Green Bay, will reduce the cost of transporting grain from the river to the lakes at least ten cents per bushel below the average railway charges, thereby effecting a saving on the movement of a single crop from the States of Ohio, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Missouri of nearly $10,000,000, or a sum nearly double the entire cost of the proposed improvement, to which saving must be added the reduced cost of transporting lumber, salt, iron, and other heavy commodities from the lakes to the Mississippi River, amounting to many millions more; and whereas this annual saving to the farmers of the Northwest will, when one-half the lands in those States are under cultivation, amount to more than twenty times the entire cost of the proposed improvement: Therefore, respectfully and earnestly pray that such appropriations be made as will insure the completion of said water-route from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan, via the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, at the earliest practicable moment, and by such improvements as will afford the cheapest and best facilities for water transportation.

We, the undersigned, farmers residing—

In the various parts of the States named—

This petition, Mr. President, is signed by 13,182 farmers of Minnesota, 12,154 of Wisconsin, 17,154 of Iowa, 5,338 of Nebraska, and 1,025 of Dakota, making an aggregate of 48,853. I want to say that this is but a faint expression of the sentiment and demand of the people of the Northwestern States upon this subject.

I have inquired of older Senators with reference to expressions of the people given by petitions heretofore, and I am informed by one who has been here perhaps longer than any other that a petition signed by three thousand names is perhaps as large as ever was presented at one time. I here present you, sir, nearly fifty thousand names, and a very large number more on the same subject were presented to the House of Representatives at this session.

I do not feel myself justified in consuming the morning hour, but I do want to impress upon the Senate and upon the committee in charge of the river and harbor bill that there is no question in which the people of one-half, if not the whole of this Union feel so intense an interest as they do in that of cheap transportation. Already during this morning hour the memorials of two or three State Legislatures have been presented urging us to take prompt and efficient action on the matter of internal improvements. Almost every day since this session commenced petitions have been sent here on this subject. By every means of expression known to the people they have told us what they desire. They are in earnest and will be heard, either by us or by our successors.

The signers of this mammoth petition which lies on my table know that for five years the average cost of transportation by rail from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan has been over seventeen cents per bushel for wheat and corn. They know also that by the improvement of this water line, if it does the work of transportation as cheaply as similar water lines are doing it to-day, it will cost them an average of only seven cents per bushel, thereby saving ten cents per bushel on their crop.

I have presented a resolution which is now pending before the Senate, and which I have endeavored to call up, not merely covering this proposition but other improvements which are equally valuable and which receive just as fully the indorsement of the people. I do most earnestly hope that before the close of this session of Congress we shall at least have the opportunity to discuss for a single hour these questions relating to the material interests of the country. The great question the people are asking everywhere is, "Will not Congress do something to aid us in our material interests?" Trembling on the verge of bankruptcy many of the best business men of the country are looking earnestly to us for help. Hundreds of thousands of idle laborers anxious for employment, but unable to find it, beg us to do something that will revive the industries of the nation. Shall we respond only by long speeches upon political questions and leave wholly untouched these material interests?

I would like to explain further the meaning of this petition; but, sir, I will withhold what I want to say until another time. I will ask the Senate to refer these petitions to the Committee on Commerce in order that while they are considering the river and harbor bill the voice of these 48,853 farmers may be heard in the committee-room. Mr. President, I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3737) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3182) for the relief of the heirs of James Barnett, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1628) for the relief of Montraville Patton, of Buncombe County, North Carolina, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Gallus Kirchner, of North Vernon, Indiana, praying compensation for two thousand three hundred and eighty and a half yards of blue limestone delivered to the United States, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1352) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of Gallus Kirchner, of the State of Indiana.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4190) for the relief of William H. Carmen, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1120) for the relief of Miss Rebecca L. Wright, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4185) for the relief of Brevet Brigadier-General B. S. Roberts, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1255) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, late chaplain of the United States Army, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PROMULGATION OF ARMY REGULATIONS.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 844) to authorize the promulgation of the general regulations for the government of the Army, to report it without amendment. This bill passed the House at the last session of Congress, and has been here for a long time. It will take but a moment to pass it, and there is considerable importance connected with it. I ask the Senate to consider it now. It merely authorizes the Secretary of War to promulgate the Army Regulations.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It repeals so much of section 20 of the act approved July 15, 1870, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," as requires the system of general regulations for the Army therein authorized to be reported to Congress at its next session and approved by that body, and authorizes the President to make and publish regulations for the government of the Army in accordance with existing laws.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. LOGAN. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator in charge be kind enough to explain to us the object of this bill?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state briefly that the Army Regulations some four years ago were referred to Congress to be acted upon by Congress. The law authorized Army regulations to be made by a board and reported to the Secretary of War and promulgated by the President. That was the old law and will be the law under this bill. But an act was passed requiring the regulations made by the board to be referred to Congress. Congress has never acted on them. We cannot get action on them. They have been lying here for four years. This bill is merely to authorize the President to promulgate the regulations. That is all there is in it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1353) for the relief of Colonel Garden Chapin and Julia P. Chapin, his wife, for property destroyed at Cooke's Spring on the 6th of August, A. D. 1861; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1354) for the relief of Henry P. Seymour, William A. Frazer, Alvin N. Sabin, and the heirs of Percy S. Leggett, late supernumerary second lieutenant of the Fifth Michigan Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLAMETTE VALLEY AND COAST RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. If there is no further morning business, I ask the indulgence of the Senate and unanimous consent for but one minute to place on their passage a couple of little bills of deep interest to our people. There can be no possible objection to either of them. I move first to take up Senate bill No. 1082.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Have we concluded the regular morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not yet closed. The introduction of bills is still in order; but the Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent in the morning hour to take up a bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope this bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. MORTON. There is no objection to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 1082.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the title of the bill read.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask if the morning business is exhausted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take up this bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1082) granting to the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad Company a right of way through the public lands for a narrow-gauge railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment in line 15 to strike out the word "adjacent" and insert "within said limits;" so as to read:

Including the right to take from the public lands within said limits materials of earth, stone, gravel, and timber necessary for the construction thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. MITCHELL. Presuming on the indulgence of the Senate, I ask it to take up one other bill of five lines, to which there can be no possible objection. It is a local matter. It is the bill (S. No. 1310) providing for the extension of the time for completing the survey and location of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall object to everything until I shall have a chance for my tombstone bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I believe there is no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall object to everything of the kind until I have an opportunity of having a vote on the question of tombstones.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered at this time.

PRESENT TO MRS. MINNIE SHERMAN FITCH.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1301) to admit free of duty the diamond necklace presented by the Khedive of Egypt to Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch, have instructed me to report the same back with a verbal amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. A similar bill has already passed both branches of Congress, but at the Treasury it is thought not to be explicit in one of its terms. This is simply to make it explicit, and it will take but a moment to pass it.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to the consideration of anything now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it lie on the table; it need not be printed; and I will call it up to-morrow morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further morning business, the Committee on the Revision of the Rules has the rest of the morning hour.

Mr. HOWE. I now throw myself once more on the indulgence of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that thirty-five minutes more may be accorded to the consideration of that bill which was up in the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator means, as he says, to throw himself on the indulgence of the Senate and not of the Committee on the Revision of the Rules, I will offer no objection so that the Committee on the Revision of the Rules will have its appropriate time at some other hour if the Senator from Wisconsin occupies the present hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to have the residue of the morning hour for the consideration of the bill in regard to the Library of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be a violation of the rule under which we are acting, and a postponement of the reports made by other committees.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator asks unanimous consent, and the Chair supposes the Senate can do anything in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will object for the benefit of the whole Senate. I think every Senator ought to object. I object, and insist on the enforcement of the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on the Revision of the Rules is entitled to the rest of the morning hour.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on the regular order of business.

PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF ABSENTEES.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I call up the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] on December 15, 1873. It has reference to expunging the names of absentees from the list for the purpose of economizing space in the RECORD and cost to the Government.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Let the resolution be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 4th of May, 1864, directing the reporter in making up the proceedings of the Senate for publication to put in a separate list the names of absentees in each call of the yeas and nays be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to hear some reason given for dropping the names of absentees. Is it simply because it occupies space in the RECORD, or not?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. As I understand, the reason is to economize space in the RECORD. It is occupying space there needlessly in the judgment of the committee and I suppose in the judgment of the Senator who offered the resolution. The object is simply to save cost and space—space in the RECORD and cost to the Treasury. There seems to be no particular necessity for keeping up this record of the names of the absentees while the names of those voting for and against any proposition are upon the record.

Mr. ANTHONY. I introduced this resolution some time ago. This publication of the names of the absentees is an innovation. It was ordered some seven or eight years ago I think rather, if such a term could be used in the Senate, in a pet. Some Senators were vexed at the absentees and moved that the names be put in the Globe, and the resolution was adopted. When you publish the yeas and publish the nays, the absentees are known as a matter of course. I see no good in continuing this list; it cumbers up the RECORD and makes more printing.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire for information how are the absentees known?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because they are neither among the yeas nor the nays.

Mr. CONKLING. How is it known who they are? I ask the question seriously, and I will put it in this form: A man sits down to look at a vote on a given question; he has obtained a copy of the Globe or of the RECORD which is not the first of the series, and therefore does not have the fact that on the first day the Vice-President caused the roll to be called and so many Senators answered, but he has just one volume. He looks and sees who voted pro and who voted con. He would like to know who there was in the Senate that year at that time. Even the honorable Senator from Rhode Island could not tell him, with all his knowledge of such things, unless he could go back and get the first volume in the series of that session and look to see who were the Senators at the beginning of the session.

I do not say how important this is; but I do venture to suggest to the Senate that it is not true practically that he who looks at a list of the yeas and a list of the nays on a given question understands as a matter of fact who are the absentees, who were the men then in the Senate who abstained from voting on that question, or who for any reason were not present when the vote was taken.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose if a man looks at the yeas and nays, he wants to know how a particular Senator voted.

Mr. CONKLING. That may or may not be.

Mr. ANTHONY. And if he wants to know how a particular Senator voted, he knows of course that he was a Senator at the time, and if his name is not among the yeas or among the nays, he knows that that Senator was absent. I do not think it should be logically necessary to look in a list of absentees to ascertain that.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I can convince the Senator in a moment that that is not the point of my suggestion. Some time ago the Senator from Delaware among others on a contested-election case read from the proceedings of the Senate long years ago touching a Rhode Island case in which there was a contest. He, like every other Senator, deemed it important to inform the Senate who were members of the Senate then who took part in what was done. Why did he do so? In order to add the weight of character and intellect and legal knowledge which that would furnish to the precedent which he cited. Now, suppose in that case it turned out that Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun, and others whom I might mention were in the Senate and abstained utterly from taking any part in the matter, and although there was action of the Senate these men were conspicuously absent, some student of those events takes the volume which contains the report, the debate, and the vote, and he sees the foot-prints which were left by thirty-odd Senators or forty and he sees nothing more.

I know, as my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] who evinces a little animation at this moment, with his usual wit suggested to me that he could find a Congressional Directory of that year, and that Congressional Directory would tell him who was there. Yes, if he has all the books in this library that the Senator proposes to cart up to Judiciary Square and all the fifty thousand that he proposes to leave as samples behind, I am perfectly well aware that this man could run this down and find out exactly who were members of the Senate at that time and who abstained from the proceeding and who thus impaired by as much weight of character as they had, the force of the precedent at which the student is looking. But my proposition is that when the Senator from Rhode Island says a man who reads the yeas and reads the nays thereby finds out who were the absentees or who were those who abstained from concurrence, he cannot vindicate that by the truth or fact of the case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. One of the great evils which this rule when adopted was designed to remedy was the fact that there were in both Houses a large number who were not punctual in their attendance upon the sessions of either House. It was supposed that publishing on each vote a list of the names of those who were absent from their seats and did not participate would tend to remedy that evil, and I think it has done so to a considerable extent; and I hope for the very pitiful amount of economy that would be saved in the publication of the RECORD the rule will not be changed.

Mr. THURMAN. I observe that in the other House a practice similar to ours prevails, except that the third list is put down as "not voting." There are the yeas and the nays, and then a list under the title "not voting." Our practice is, or our rule, to put down the "yeas" and the "nays," and then a list under the head of "absent," which is sometimes true and sometimes not true, because sometimes Senators are here and do not vote. But I think the rule must have been adopted for the reason suggested by the Senator from Vermont, and I think the tendency of the thing is to prevent absenteeism. I should not like, therefore, to see it rescinded.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it not true that in every parliamentary sense a gentleman who is present and does not vote is absent? If a Senator is in his seat and does not vote, in a parliamentary sense he is absent. The rule requires him to vote, and if he does not vote he is presumed to be absent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think that this list of the absent is logically the most important list of Senators there is, because generally it comes very near being the largest. It is usually the largest subdivision. If you divide the Senate into three sections, the absentees are generally in the plurality. I notice in yesterday's proceedings, on the last page of the RECORD to-day, that on a motion to adjourn there were 23 in the affirmative, 27 in the negative, and 23 absent. That was a tie between the affirmatives and the absentees. On the next motion I observe there were 21 affirmatives, 25 negatives, and 27 absent. The absentees were in a clear plurality over any one of the other sections of the Senate.

Inasmuch as the people are entitled to know what we are doing and the way we are doing it, I think, as the Senator from Ohio says, that it is of real importance to preserve this list of the notables who figure in the third subdivision of the names of the Senators; and it does have some tendency to prevent Senators being unnecessarily absent. Of course, the word "absent" does not prove in the way we do things that Senators are absolutely away. They may be here and may have been paired. If so, it is generally stated; so that is an explanation. They may be here, as I saw an occasion on a night not long ago when a dozen or more Senators sat in their seats and did not vote at all, not being paired. They were present in the body but absent in the spirit, as I must suppose, for they were visible but they did not seem to have any voice.

Another thing is that this collection of names shows every reader at once the whole body of the Senate. Every Senator's name is before him, and he knows the State that he comes from if he has any knowledge; when he sees the name he knows where the Senator is from, and in that way he gets a clearer idea of the operations of the Senate and of the Senators who attend to business, and those who are obliged to be absent, and so on, than he can in any other way. Now to cut this out on the theory that you are going to save, I suppose about five cents every time, it appears to me would be a mistake. I hope we shall leave it where it stands.

Mr. ANTHONY. The word "absent" is not only erroneous, but often very unjust. At this time of the session when there are four or five committees of conference sitting all the time and the chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations and Finance and of other committees are obliged to be absent, they are put down in the list as "absent" precisely the same as though they were neglecting their duties. Besides that, it is very common, we all know, and perhaps it is absolutely necessary for our convenience that we should pair sometimes, and although that is contrary to the rule strictly enforced, the rule never has been enforced, and if we publish the absentees we should publish the pairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Senator who sits farthest from me from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has stated the precise occasion which led to the adoption of this rule. My recollection concurs with his. I think the amendment to the rule was made on the motion of the Senator from my State who occupied the seat which I now occupy, (Mr. Fessenden;) and according to my recollection it was done at the end of a somewhat protracted debate. I think it was done with the purpose of inducing Senators to remain in their seats. That was the precise object. Now, every Senator knows that in long and protracted debates these seats will be empty; and you may place rule upon rule and you cannot prevent it. There is no constitutional power to do it, and there is no constitutional duty that requires men here to sit hour after hour to listen to political essays which contain no information that they have not already themselves, and they will go, some to their committee-rooms, some to other places.

Now, the object for which the rule was adopted having totally and thoroughly failed, I think we may as well recur to the practice that prevailed before the rule was adopted. It cumbers your RECORD; it takes the time of the printer in composing the names of the absentees, all of which may be gathered precisely as well otherwise. But it is true, as my colleague says, that if a Senator is in his seat and neglects to vote, he is in the parliamentary sense absent. He does not give the expression of his opinion upon the pending question and is not therefore present for that question; and he is absent from that vote which makes the record of the Senate.

There being no earthly purpose subserved by the rule and a little economy in abolishing it, I am in favor of the pending resolution and shall vote for it.

Mr. BAYARD obtained the floor.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me a moment to ask the Senate to continue the time of this committee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; we cannot continue the time.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will state to the Senator that by the consent of the Senate a portion of the limited time, one-fourth of the residue of the hour left us, was occupied in the passage of one or two bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was your fault.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from Vermont says it is the fault of the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Rules. It would be rather ungracious for the chairman to interpose an objection when a Senator rises in his place and asks consent of the Senate to pass a local bill. I am not disposed to do that. By unanimous consent of the Senate these bills were passed and time taken. I merely ask the same courtesy to this committee which has been extended to others, that the time be extended for half an hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. BAYARD. Why cannot this question be decided?

Mr. THURMAN. Before the question is put I would like the Senator to state what business he proposes to take up before I give consent to extend the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that objection has been made to the extension. It therefore cannot be had. The Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor for about one minute. At twelve o'clock the regular order comes up.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to interfere with gentlemen in charge of business of this kind. I intended to submit some remarks; but perhaps they would not be very valuable on the subject of striking out the list of those who are termed absentees, technical absentees; but if the motion be made to extend the time of this committee I shall say a few words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey;

A bill (H. R. No. 4837) for the relief of Charles A. Luke;

A bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance;"

A bill (H. R. No. 4472) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to defend certain suits against David R. Dillon;

A bill (H. R. No. 4573) to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 4839) for the relief of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Sheppard, deceased; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following concurrent resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A resolution for the printing and binding in quarto form of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the final reports of the geological survey of the Territories for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution;

A resolution for the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874; and

A resolution for the printing of the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1874.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 1938) to provide for settlement with certain railway companies; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4835) in relation to the Quartermaster's Department, fixing its status, reducing its numbers, and regulating appointments and promotions therein.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ALCORN, Mr. FLANAGAN, Mr. MERRIMON, Mr. HAMILTON of Maryland, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. RANSOM, Mr. ROBERTSON, and Mr. BOREMAN presented amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Commitee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. R BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 23d instant approved and signed the following bills:

An act (S. No. 625) for the relief of Lemuel D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas;

An act (S. No. 836) granting a pension to William Ira Mayfield;

An act (S. No. 862) granting a pension to Margaret S. Hastings;

An act (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Margaret C. Wells;

An act (S. No. 1080) granting a pension to J. W. Caldwell, of Marshall County, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 1154) granting a pension to William Williams;

An act (S. No. 1205) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Lydia A. Church, minor daughter of Nathaniel G. Church; and

An act (S. No. 1213) granting a pension to Nathan Upham.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, at this period in the session, with the Calendar filled with a long list of bills which have received favorable action at the hands of the different committees and which are pressing for the formal and favorable action of the Senate, I believe that no extended discussion of this bill is needed or would be justifiable. Nor do I believe that the Senate fail to understand the facts in regard to Colorado. Situated in the center of the continent, extending from the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude on the south to the forty-first parallel of latitude on the north, and from the twenty-fifth meridian of longitude on the east to the thirty-second meridian of longitude on the west, embracing an area of one hundred and six thousand square miles; with a vast mineral wealth hidden away in the recesses of her lofty mountains and her lowly valleys; with a climate wonderful for its healthfulness; with a soil capable by irrigation of producing an agricultural product sufficient to support a population of at least two millions of people; settled with inhabitants hardy, brave, enterprising, loyal, and intelligent, Colorado is ready to throw off the swaddling-clothes of a Territory and assume position as a sovereign and independent State.

There is, I apprehend, and can be but one possible objection and but one possible question to be considered and but one point upon which opposition can be made to the present admission of Colorado. That question is in regard to her present population. Upon that point the Committee on Territories believe from the best information which they were able to obtain that Colorado to-day contains a population of one hundred and fifty thousand. Of course this must be based to a great extent upon statistics and estimates, as no official and formal census of the Territory has been taken for the last five years. The population of the Territory by the census of 1870 was about forty thousand. There are some comparative estimates which can be made from the statistics of the Territory at that time and the statistics of the Territory since that time which go to show the ratio of the increase of population. For instance, the revenue from the postal department in that Territory that year was twenty-nine thousand and some hundred dollars. The revenue of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, was $102,000—more than three times, nearly four times the revenue derived from the postal service in the year 1870. I think that there is no better, no surer test than that. The increase in the population is represented perhaps as accurately by the increase of revenue of the postal service as in any other way. So in other respects. At the time the census of 1870 was taken there was not in the Territory a single line of completed railroad, and now there are seven hundred and thirty-five miles of completed railroad built, at an estimated cost of about $30,000,000. So that it is probable that no Territory has been admitted with the aggregate of wealth, the aggregate of business, the aggregate of commercial importance that Colorado has at the present time

Since the original Constitution was adopted twenty-four States have been added to this Union. Of these, Texas, Maine, and West Virginia were separated from other States or admitted as independent sovereignties, as in the case of Texas. Consequently twenty-one States have been admitted from a territorial condition since the Government was founded. Of these twenty-one but two Territories were admitted as States which had at the time of their admission a greater population than Colorado now has, and these Territories were Michigan and Wisconsin, each of them having, I think, a population of about two hundred thousand; Minnesota having a population of about the same amount that Colorado now has, and the others, such States as Illinois and Ohio, having only about one-third the population which Colorado now has. I believe, Mr. President, the only possible objection that can be raised to the admission of Colorado as a State, as I said, is the question of population, and upon that point I believe her population is ample to entitle her under the law to a single Representative in Congress, and I hope there will be no prolonged discussion upon this question.

Mr. SARGENT. The thirteenth section of this bill requires some explanation, and I should like to ask the Senator having it in charge what it refers to?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That refers to the ordinary grant of land which has been made to the other States which have been admitted heretofore for internal improvements:

There shall be granted to each State specified in the first section of this act five hundred thousand acres of land for the purposes of internal improvement.

That is the provision of the act of 1841.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is not entirely correct in stating that these grants have been made to all new States which have been admitted. I know it was not so in reference to California, and I presume the grant has grown with years, so that as each new State has been admitted it has been extended.

The provisions in this bill are rather liberal for land grants. For instance, section 8 gives thirty-two thousand acres, fifty entire sections, to the State for the erection of public buildings. Section 9 gives thirty-two thousand acres for the erection of a penitentiary or State prison. Section 10 gives forty-six thousand and eighty acres to be applied as the Legislature sees fit for a university. Section 11 gives six salt springs and thirty-eight hundred and forty acres contiguous thereto. Section 12 gives 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the State prior or subsequent to the admission of the State; and then section 13 comes in and gives five hundred thousand acres besides.

These are very liberal grants of public lands; and I think experience has pretty well demonstrated that grants of lands to States for almost any purpose whatever are simply means by which the public lands are withdrawn from homestead and pre-emption and under the influences that are brought about the State Legislatures get into the hands of speculators. I doubt whether such grants have ever been of any particular advantage to any State which has received them. I certainly am not in favor of continuing them upon the great scale which is provided for in this bill.

But before making any particular motion in reference to that matter, I desire to make one relating to section 12. I propose to strike out the words "prior or," in line 3 of section 12. That section provides for paying over to Colorado—

Five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union.

We thus accompany the admission of the State by a very large demand on the Treasury. This has been an organized Territory for a great many years; a large amount of public lands in it has probably been sold under the pre-emption laws, and we ought to understand how much money is being granted by this section by reckoning up the amount of public lands which have been heretofore sold. We have been keeping up a territorial organization in this Territory at our own expense. We have paid the expenses of the Legislature; we have paid the expense of the governor and of all the territorial officers for a good many years; and the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of sales which have heretofore taken place in the Territory ought to go to liquidate the debt due to the Government on this account or to square the account. It does not seem reasonable that this amount should be paid over to the Territory when it is to be admitted as a State. I will not speak of the policy of paying the amount which may subsequently accrue; but I think a reservation should be made in that case by providing that where lands are given under the pre-emption laws to settlers there shall be no demand upon the Government for commutation upon that account, and that no demand of the 5 per cent. shall be made in respect to lands which are reserved for any public uses.

We have a historical tangle growing out of a principle of that kind. The Choctaw claim, which has been referred to quite lately in this Chamber, grows out quite largely of a claim of the Indians to be reimbursed for lands which the Government reserved for public uses. They claim that a percentage on the value of those lands should be added to a further sum which they, I think improperly, demand for reimbursement for lands which the Government sold. The Government having given them in exchange a larger number of acres in another place, they hold that all the money which came from the sale of the lands they exchanged should go to them, and they go further and say that even where the Government reserved land for its own use and never sold it and consequently never received any money for it, should be accounted as if it was sold for money. The question also has arisen in the case of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, under a claim for a balance of the 5 per cent., they holding that where lands were reserved by the Government they should be appraised and those States made good for the difference which was caused thereby. I do not want to have such a question raised in reference to Colorado, and I do not think it is fair. We have changed our laws since many of the States were admitted; we have liberalized the pre-emption laws; we have authorized citizens to go without money and without price (except a few fees to maintain the system) upon the public lands and we give to the settlers those lands. If this is to be followed by an appraisement of these lands and the Government is to pay 5 per cent. on their value to the State of Colorado hereafter, it seems to me there is not sufficient attention paid to the interests of the Treasury. I want to propose an amendment that will exclude that conclusion, and also exclude the conclusion that there shall be any appraisement for Indian reservations, or military reservations, or other lands reserved for public uses. But now my motion is to strike out the words "prior or," so that we shall not have to make an accounting for lands heretofore sold in this Territory and pay over, I do not know what amount, but somewhere from $10,000 to $500,000. In the absence of figures, I do not know which of these suppositions would be correct.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to ask the attention of the Senator from California to a section upon which I desire his opinion as a subject with which he is familiar—to the eighth section. I will read that section:

That, provided the State of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, on or before the 1st day of January, 1878, shall be, and are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Knowing the Senator from California to be entirely familiar with the law in relation to mineral lands, a subject with which I am not familiar, I ask his attention to this section for the purpose of asking the question whether this power granted to the Legislature of Colorado to select and locate without limit or without restriction fifty sections of land would not authorize them to select and locate mineral lands?

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably. I am glad the Senator has called my attention to it.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to have the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge, as well as of the Senator from California, directed to that question, for I suppose it could hardly be intended that the Legislature should be permitted to select the most valuable mineral lands in Colorado for the purpose of enabling them to erect their public buildings.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there not a law now that prevents mineral lands being sectionized at all?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the law regulating the mineral portion of the country to be where lodes are located there is only so much permitted to be taken up; and such land is not susceptible of entry at all.

Mr. SARGENT. The law has been changed in that respect, and now miners can take up lands by legal subdivisions. The provision which the Senator refers to was repealed in 1872 so as to facilitate the taking up of mineral lands, so that a miner whose claim is forty acres or a company of miners whose claim is forty acres may describe it by the regular rectangular system. What the Senator refers to is not now the law.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator if this is not almost precisely a copy of the bill that admitted Nevada and of quite a number of bills for the admission of other States in the West?

Mr. SARGENT. I should have to examine in that respect to answer the question.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand it is. I do not want to discuss the bill, but I wish to direct attention to one fact. The objection that is made is to the taking of mineral land and to the grant of the 5 per cent. We ought at least to deal fairly with the new States that are coming in. The State that I in part represent, when it was admitted into the Union, was allowed every sixteenth section throughout the whole State, and received it. The sixteenth section in every township was set apart for school purposes. The State also received 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. It does seem to me that States which have been admitted on such terms as the States have heretofore been ought not to complain of the terms of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to direct my friend's attention to section 7, which gives not only section 16 but section 36 also for the purpose he refers to:

SEC. 7. That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands, equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not more than one quarter-section, and as contiguous as may be, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools.

Mr. STEWART. That provision has been in such bills for over twenty years.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit it; but the Senator remarked that in Illinois we gave the sixteenth section. I want to show that we also give the thirty-sixth section to Colorado.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not sure but that Congress did the same to several States, but I will not state it for I have not looked recently at the legislation. I am sure, however, that in other States the same thing was done. This is a copy of that provision.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not complaining of that provision, but of the other one.

Mr. LOGAN. The other one is applicable in some of the States which have been admitted.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not object to the 5 per cent. on sales hereafter, but I do not want this accounting on past sales which may bring the Treasury largely in debt.

Mr. LOGAN. Whether it applies to sales hereafter or includes prior sales it is precisely the language incorporated in bills admitting States heretofore. The Senator says some trouble has arisen in reference to that matter. That is true; but the question—I am not going into it now—in reference to Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana in connection with the national road is a very different question from this. The claim as to paying back a portion of the 5 per cent. there arose on entirely different grounds.

At this late hour in the session, when sending the bill back to the House may probably cause its defeat, it does seem to me that we ought not to find these objections to the bill for the admission of this Territory as a State when the same provisions precisely are in bills admitting States heretofore where they have asked it, and no hardship has resulted and no complaint has been made in reference to them. It seems to me on the same principle we ought to allow these provisions to be incorporated in the bill admitting this State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The honorable Senator from California, in the name of economy, proposes to strike out two words, the usual words which have been in other enabling acts and which have allowed other incoming States to obtain 5 per cent. on the proceeds of those public lands which had been sold during their territorial existence.

Whatever may be the purpose of this amendment, the result probably of any amendment to the bill which would remit it to the other House would be to defeat the bill, and the effect of this economical measure would be that the United States will continue to pay all the expenses of the Territory of Colorado for an indefinite period of time.

Now, I think it would not be very becoming in the United States to select Colorado as a conspicuous instance of economy. I think that if Colorado is admitted she should receive the liberal provisions which other new States have received heretofore on their admission, and I think that the 5 per cent. on the proceeds of the sale of public lands, which other new States have received, should very properly be allowed to her in order that this new State may have some small amount in her treasury at the inauguration of the new State government. As a matter of economy I am sure it is better that this bill should pass in its present form than that the Territory of Colorado should continue to be governed at the expense of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question, Mr. President?

Mr. SARGENT. My amendment is to strike out the words "have been or" in lines 2 and 3, and the words "prior or" in line 3 of section 12.

Now, to show that I am not captious at all, am simply pleading for what has been done heretofore, I call attention to my own State where mineral lands were excepted, while there is no exception in this case. Here you grant absolutely without any reservation all these 613,920 acres of land; and I inquire whether that is wise when it is known that the principal industry of Colorado as of my own State is in mines of gold and silver? How are you going to protect the miners in their rights there under the laws of the United States? You grant these lands absolutely to the State. The Senator shakes his head. Let him make a logical answer to it, then; a shake of the head is not a logical answer. In the California act, section 6, making donations of land, and which by the way were much more restricted than those in this bill, reads:

> With the exception of lands appropriated under the authority of this act, or reserved by competent authority; and excepting also the lands claimed under any foreign grant or title, and the mineral lands.

I think the same provision was in the Nevada act; but as to that my friend from Nevada can inform me. I know we have jealously required, and the Government has pursued the policy in all grants of public lands, that the mineral lands shall be excepted. You sell them at a higher price. You sell your quartz lands at $5 an acre, other mineral lands at $2.50 an acre; they are never allowed to go under your pre-emption and homestead laws; but here is a proposition to give six hundred and thirteen thousand acres, without any reservation at all, and do you not suppose that the speculators know where to direct the locations of these lands and that they will select mineral lands? There will come from that State a wail of distress from men engaged in mining operations when they find that speculators have got the title of the State to the lands which they supposed they held under a United States title or under a possessory right; and a conflict will be brought about between the speculators and the miners, and acts like those that occurred in my own State recently, under an attempt to evade the exception which was named in the section that I have referred to in the case of the Keystone mine, may be witnessed.

The Keystone mine was a mine which had been held for fifteen or twenty years. There was machinery on it the value of a quarter of a million of dollars, and the mine itself was worth probably a million and a half, and it was supposed there was a perfect title; but parties came in under this very section and surreptitiously, or at any rate without its being generally known, procured the title of the State under the assumption that the State could grant a title. They litigated it before the Land Office and in the courts and were finally beaten, but only because the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior and the courts gave effect to the exception of mineral lands. Otherwise the men who had developed that mine and put all their means into it, and had made a valuable property of it, would have been turned out in favor of men who gave $2.25 an acre to the State for it, and the number of acres was very small.

I want to prevent such things happening in Colorado; and the Senators say that may delay the passage of the bill or defeat it. Then if these evils are in our way, if they necessarily result from careless legislation, defeat the bill, for it is more important that the people of Colorado, the great mining population there, should not be oppressed and the rights taken away from them which they now hold under the United States law, or which they now hold under a possession which is not an exact title yet, than that we should hurry the State into the Union under the proposition now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to inquire whether the Senator knows that there is any placer mining going on in Colorado.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no exception here of quartz mining. There is mining going on in Colorado, or else the argument for the bill falls. There is a large mining population and there is no exception of quartz mining.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Those lands are open to settlement.

Mr. SARGENT. They are sold as public lands at $1.25 an acre unless excepted, and are entered up as such. The Senator by his very question confesses the strength of the argument.

But the question now pending is whether we shall make an accounting with this Territory for the years past when it has been a Territory, and pay out of the Treasury 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands sold heretofore. I think we ought not to do that. As we have paid all their bills this length of time, it is only fair that they should ask us from the time of their admission to pay this amount if we are to pay it at all.

Mr. STEWART. In regard to the particular point now before the Senate, I observe that there is a difference in the different acts. The tenth section of the act for the admission of Nevada provides for granting—

> Five per cent. of the proceeds of sales of public lands lying in said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State, &c.

Mr. SARGENT. That is just what I propose here.

Mr. STEWART. But in the act passed at the same session a day or two afterward, with regard to Nebraska, the following is the proviso, which is the same as in this bill:

> That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of sales of public lands lying within said State which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, &c.

I have not had time to look over all the acts, but I believe this provision is in the acts for several other States. There is no mineral-land exception in Nevada. In all respects this bill is the same as the Nevada bill, except in regard to the twelfth section. I do not apprehend, in administering this law, any difficulty on the mineral-land question, because, in the first place, it must be done by the State authorities under State law; and I do not think a Legislature that would provide for the selection of mineral lands would ever be a Legislature again or any member thereof. I think it is perfectly safe to leave it to the State Legislature whether they will select mineral lands, because I do not think if they did any of them would ever go to the Legislature again. The people would not trust them. In the next place, before the lands can be selected under this section, they must be surveyed lands or subject to survey, and the surveys are only extended to mineral lands under certain restrictions. The mineral lands are only surveyed for the purpose of disposition as mineral lands. They are surveyed in pursuance of the applications of those who desire patents. If a man desires mineral lands, he applies for a survey and a patent. The Government does not survey the mineral lands on its own motion. So they will never be in a situation to be selected by the State. There cannot be any possible danger on the mineral-land question; and the only point is as to the few dollars that may arise from 5 per cent. of the proceeds of lands already sold. The States on this point have been treated differently; the precedents are not uniform. It is a small amount, and it cannot make any great difference, so I do not think it worth while to amend the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator remember the case I referred to where the Keystone mine was attempted to be seized under a title from the State?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; that was an outrageous proceeding.

Mr. SARGENT. Why may not that arise here? If you license the State in this instance to select mineral lands, why may it not arise again? The only thing that saved us there was the mineral exception.

Mr. STEWART. There was no mineral exception in the grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections.

Mr. SARGENT. There was in the California act, and this was a mine in California. By pleading the exception we saved that mine.

Mr. STEWART. There was a general reservation of mineral lands in the California act.

Mr. SARGENT. The grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections contained the reservation of mineral lands. It was that reservation which enabled us to save the Keystone mine from being gobbled up under a pretended State title.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have a single suggestion to make in response to the Senator from California in regard to his motion to strike out the word "prior." The honorable Senator states that the word "prior" was not in the act for the admission of the State of Nevada. That is very true, and for the very good reason that no public lands in the then Territory of Nevada had been sold previous to its admission as a State, and consequently there was no propriety in the insertion of that word. In regard to my own State, public lands had been sold, as is the case in Colorado, and the word "prior" was very properly inserted.

Mr. STEWART. Upon the point raised by the Senator from California I make this distinction: The sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections were granted to the several States by a general act in place; that is, not to be selected. That was an absolute grant, and required no selection whatever, and consequently it was important that there should be a reservation, because it granted the particular sections. Here is a grant, not in place, but to be selected from sections. There cannot be sections, according to the rulings of the Department, until there has been a survey and the land has been sectionized. The Government, under its present arrangements, does not sectionize the mineral land, and does not survey them for that purpose, but surveys them on application of parties who desire title. Consequently under the system the Legislature cannot select mineral lands, because they would not be sectionized and subject to selection. I do not think there would be any danger even if they had power to do it, for no Legislature would do it.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator must remember that a bill passed in 1872 in which he and I had so very large a part and consulted so often, where the prohibition which before that time existed on the survey of mineral lands was repeated; and in my State, and it may be so in Colorado, under the law there is no distinction in surveying now, whether lands are mineral or agricultural. The surveys run right along over both.

The seventh section of this bill, to which I further call the Senator's attention, provides for the same grant in place of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, so that the mischiefs which I referred to may just as well apply under the Colorado bill as they did in the case of the Keystone mine, where we were only saved by the fact that there was a reservation of mineral lands from the grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections. I want that same chance for the miners of Colorado that we have found the benefit of in California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, which will be read:

The SECRETARY. The amendment is in section 12, to strike out, in lines 2 and 3, the words "have been or" and in line 3 to strike out the words "prior or;" so as to make the section read:

That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, &c.

A division was called for, and the ayes were 11.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays. Let us see whether we have a quorum of the Senate when we are attending to such business as this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I should like to be informed by some one who has examined this question whether other States admitted into the Union have been admitted on the terms contained in this section. If they have had 5 per cent. on the proceeds of all lands sold before that time paid to them, then Colorado should be treated in the same way. If they have not, that may alter the question. If this is to take money out of the Treasury and pay it over to the State, I simply want to know what the practice has been.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say for the information of the honorable Senator that it has been the practice in late years, applied to my own State and to other States which have been lately admitted; but the word "prior" was not in the enabling act for the admission of Nevada, because no public lands had been sold in that Territory prior to its admission as a State, and consequently there was no propriety in the insertion of that word.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know how that may be. I know the State of Nevada was a Territory for two or three years before its admission as a State; and I presume that during that long time there must have been some land sold to the citizens of that Territory. Section 10 of that act provides that—

Five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making and improving public roads, constructing ditches or canals, to effect a general system of irrigation of the agricultural land in the State as the Legislature shall direct.

I propose that the same rule shall apply here, and it ought to apply in all cases, and it especially ought to apply where we have maintained a territorial government for so many years, paying all its expenses, and where the fund must have accumulated very largely. Where a Territory is almost immediately admitted as a State, so that such a provision would cause us to expend very little money on its account, it might not be worth while to raise the question whether the sales should have been "prior" or "subsequent;" but where the amount is necessarily large the distinction is worth attending to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can see no good reason for taking 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands which have been heretofore sold and covered into the Treasury out of the Treasury now and giving it to this State after it is formed. It is certainly a very liberal donation to the State to give it 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands which may hereafter be sold. I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the Senator from California. I think it is right and in the interest of economy and protecting the Treasury.

Mr. CRAGIN. There is no time to examine this question; but I have been on the Territorial Committee for ten years, and I venture the assertion here to-day that no enabling act providing for the admission of any Territory into the Union as a State, except the Territory of Nevada, can be found without the exact language of this bill. It has been the practice from the foundation of the Government to give this 5 per cent. on sales of public lands prior and subsequent to their admission.

Mr. STEWART. In Nevada there had been no prior sales.

Mr. SARGENT. So far from its being the practice from the foundation of the Government, in my own State the Government did not give us the 5 per cent. We never received a dollar of it. And the same is true of Oregon.

Mr. CRAGIN. California was not a Territory.

Mr. SARGENT. Oregon was a Territory, and you did not give it a dollar. I say California was a Territory, and we thundered here at the doors of Congress a long while to be admitted.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator knows that it was not a Territory in the sense in which we use that term.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the argument is all the stronger in our favor, because we did not put the Government to any expense to maintain us in infancy. We paid our own bills; and if other States had this set-off, certainly California ought to have had it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the admission of the Territory of Colorado as a State upon a just bill, which shall do justice to the people of that Territory and do justice to the United States; but I have had frequent occasion to say that I do not think we are justified in passing a measure without proper amendments, if they be right and necessary, upon the fear that the other House may not agree to them. If we were to adopt that as a principle and rule, we should be foreclosed from making any amendments at all to House bills, because nobody knows to a certainty that any amendment that we make will be agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be as if there were but one House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator from New York says, that would result practically in there being but one House. If this bill can be so amended as to conform to my ideas of justness and fairness, I shall vote for it with pleasure; but if we are to reject amendments which seem to be proper in themselves upon the mere ground of a supposed expediency in respect of not sending the bill back to the House of Representatives, then I cannot say that I could vote for it.

Now I come to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] an amendment which I had marked in the bill and which I had intended to propose myself, to strike out that part of section 12 which provides for paying to this new State 5 per cent. of the proceeds of all the public lands in that Territory that we have sold. I do not see the ground of justice upon which, when a people rich enough and numerous enough and strong enough to be a State apply to us to be admitted as a State in the Union, we are to put our hands into the pockets of the people of the United States and take out the money which now justly belongs to them and give to that particular State any sum of money whatever.

I see the force of what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has said about what has been done hitherto in respect of many of the States, but I have never voted for any such proposition, and I do not see the ground upon which I can do so. The question to me is not what has been done before, but what is right; and I do not see, arguing as a question now before us to be decided, upon what ground it is that the people of a Territory who ask to be admitted as a State are to say, "we shall be entitled to a certain proportion of the proceeds of the public lands already sold within our borders." I can see the force, as an act of generosity and assistance, in saying "the public lands already unsold in your Territory and new State, when they are sold, shall be subject to a certain percentage which shall go into your treasury," because the ownership by the United States of these lands of course, until they are sold, prevents the Territory from being filled up. I should be willing, as an act of fair and generous dealing, to say that when all these lands which are not yet taken up shall be sold for cash, not upon estimates upon reservations or other things, but when they are actually sold, a certain percentage of the sales may be devoted to your local purposes. I am willing to do that, but I am not willing to say that the people of the United States shall be taxed to pay to the people of the State of Colorado, who claim to be rich enough and strong enough to be a State now, a part of the public moneys that have been received from public lands or from any other sources already gone by. I do not see the justice of it; I do not see the philosophy of it. I know there are precedents of that kind, but I think it time, in the present state of the country, that we should abandon precedents which to my mind have no longer any force.

I hope therefore, Mr President, confining what I have now to say to the very topic under consideration, that we shall agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know that I ought to say anything more on this amendment. So far as the amount actually involved is concerned it is a matter of very little importance to the people of Colorado. It is a matter of importance to the people of Colorado and to the people of this country, in my judgment, that this bill should pass, and therefore I am earnestly opposed to the adoption of any amendment, for the reason that while I do not think the 5 per cent. amounts to any very large sum, I do think that the admission of Colorado at this time is a matter of very great importance, and I believe that the adoption of this or any other amendment to this bill will peril and probably defeat the final passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I as cordially concur with the views expressed by the honorable Senator from California on my right [Mr. SARGENT] that I do not think it is an argument fair to be made upon a question of so much importance as this that the amendment would imperil this bill. I would ask the honorable Senator from Nebraska how can an amendment that is proper and legitimate and right and fair, as this appears to be, imperil the bill in anywise? I take it for granted that we as a co-ordinate department of this Government have a right, and we should exercise that right, of putting fair and legitimate amendments upon any bill. We have got eight days of this session remaining. This bill can be returned to the House of Representatives, and if it is so imperatively demanded that it should be passed, the House can act upon a proposition of this kind without much debate or without any debate at all.

Therefore I cannot see the force of the objection of my friend on my left [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that we are to force this bill through with obnoxious provisions, provisions which I do not see how he himself can maintain before this body or any other fairly, particularly when it may be doubtful upon other questions involved in it whether this Territory should now be admitted as a State. At all events, if that people is entitled to admission as a State into this Union, we should be careful that, in the organic law by which it is authorized to form a State government, we do no wrong to the people of the United States or to any State in the Union.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, I am prepared to vote for some act to enable the people of this Territory to form a State government preparatory to their being admitted into the Union; but unless this bill be amended in some of its details I shall have to vote against it. The only question that has ever operated upon my mind in regard to the passage of any measure of this kind is whether they have sufficient population in the Territory. Before the Committee on Territories, of which I am a member, I think it was pretty well demonstrated at the last session that they had the requisite number. I am inclined to favor some measure, as I stated; but in looking at the details of this bill it is so entirely different from any that I have been acquainted with, and especially from the conditions upon which the State of California was admitted into the Union, that it is a matter of surprise and astonishment to me. Section 7 provides:

That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands, equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not more than one-quarter section, and as contiguous as may be, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools.

If I am not mistaken it was section 16, without the thirty-sixth in jour State. Then in section 8—

Fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, &c., are hereby granted, &c., for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State, &c.

The Government is to have no right to interfere in the selection and location of these lands. It is to be done under the direction of the Legislature of the State or Territory of Colorado. The Department of the Interior would have no right to interfere in any way with the selection or location of those lands. Perhaps that may be right; but I am inclined to think that it is not, in view of other considerations which occur to my mind.

Section 9 provides—

That fifty other entire sections of land as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

Again, this is to be located and selected under the direction of the Legislature of the Territory. Section 10 provides—

That seventy-two other sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the uses and support of a State university, to be selected in the manner as aforesaid.

Again, by direction of the Legislature of the Territory. Section 11 provides—

That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each—

Giving them discretionary powers to go beyond what might be adjoining and which in their opinion may be contiguous—shall be granted to said State for its use, the said land to be selected by the governor of said State within two years after the admission of the State, &c.

Thus putting it out of the power of the Government or the Department in any way to interfere with the selection and location of these lands.

Mineral lands are not exempt by anything that appears here, and with this discretionary power of location and selection by the Legislature and by the governor all the mineral lands in the Territory of Colorado might be taken up under the magnificent grant of lands which is contained in this bill.

Next comes section 12, to which my colleague has proposed an amendment:

That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State, which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making such internal improvements within said State as the Legislature thereof may direct.

In the State of California all mineral lands have been hitherto reserved from sale. They are common grants to the people of the State and to the people of the United States. Any one may go there upon the mineral lands and pursue the occupation of mining. They are exempt, as I say; but there is no exemption here. On the contrary, this bill contains a power of itself to enable that Territory to control the entire mineral lands of Colorado.

I desire to propose as an amendment to insert as an additional section, to be section 16, the following:

That all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation and grants of this act.

I submit it at this time because I am on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BOUTWELL in the chair.) There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. HAGER. It is not an amendment to the amendment, but I offer it as an additional section to the bill in connection with what I have said and because I happen to be on the floor at this time.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not intend this morning to take any part in this discussion, although I have done so to a very limited extent, for the reason that I am not feeling in a condition to-day to enter into a discussion of any length on anything. But when I hear the Senator from California on my right [Mr. HAGER] speak of the admission of California and the precedent which should apply from it, I feel like reminding him of the fact that the admission of California stands upon ground entirely different from the admission of any other State. It is a well-known fact in the political history of this country that the admission of California was as a part of a set of compromise measures agreed upon in the Congress of the United States. The admission of California was upon different ground from the conditions asked here or that were asked in reference to the admission of any other State. When we come to speak of precedents by which we might, whether we ought or not to be, be governed, we should refer to the precedent of States placed on a different basis from California at the time of its admission.

I said a moment ago that I would have no particular objection to these amendments, provided there was time enough in the residue of the session to insure the passage of the bill by the concurrence in these amendments of the other House. I would vote for the amendments if I thought there was anything in them that amounted to enough to require an expression on that side.

The first amendment mentioned by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is in reference to the word "prior," that is, that the 5 per cent. shall not be paid for lands sold prior to the admission of the State, but shall apply to lands sold subsequent to the admission of the State. Upon that point I desire to ask the Senator, and ask him seriously, what the distinction is between the Government paying 5 per cent. on lands sold prior to the admission and on lands sold subsequent to admission. So far as the principle is concerned, there is no difference and there can be no distinction. The only difference is that the percentage on lands sold subsequent to the admission can then be paid out of the money received at the time the lands are sold, while if the land was sold prior to the admission we should have already received the money in the Treasury, and would have to pay out of the Treasury 5 per cent. of the amount we had already got in from the sale of these lands. If any distinction can be drawn in principle on that proposition, I must confess my inability to discover it.

The next proposition is that the mineral lands are not excepted. Now, I have no objection to excepting mineral lands. I do not think they ought to be selected by the State; but let us reason about this thing; let us look at it in a plain, practical point of view, and see what the result is. Do not Senators who favor this amendment know the fact that the Government has not surveyed the mineral lands? Do they not know the fact that the Government does not propose to survey the mineral lands? Do they not know the fact that the mineral lands are subject to location by persons taking them up for mining purposes in small amounts, and that they pay four dollars an acre? They may take them up in small amounts. This bill must necessarily refer to placer lands, for this reason: Placer lands are the lands that are subject under the law to purchase from the Government. Its application therefore must be to the lands surveyed and for sale by the Government, and not to the lands which have been excepted from survey. The Senator from California lives in a mining region; and does he not know that if the officers of a State were to select a certain number of sections of land in a mountainous region without reference to the mines, where mines might be discovered and located, where they could not survey their claim, every constituent of theirs would look upon them as being at least partially insane, when there were placer lands surveyed by the Government on which their selections ought to be made and would be made? It does seem to me that that is reasonable at least to presume.

Without extending my remarks very far, I wish to call attention to one precedent, and that I only allude to because it is my own State. When the bill was passed April 18, 1818, admitting Illinois into the Union, that State was admitted upon four specified conditions. What were they?

First. That section numbered sixteen in every township, and, when such section has been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to the State for the use of the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools.

There in that vast domain of Illinois, almost every acre of which was susceptible of cultivation, every sixteenth section was granted to the people of the State for school purposes. Following this is a condition in reference to salt springs, which the Senator objects to here. We have a number of salt springs in Illinois, and at one time a great amount of salt was made there:

Second. That all salt springs within such State, and the land reserved for the use of the same, shall be granted to the said State for the use of said State, and the same to be used under such terms and conditions and regulations as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: Provided, The Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years at any one time.

There is the proposition in reference to salt springs and land adjacent thereto.

Third. That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying within such State, and which shall be sold by Congress, from and after the 1st day of January, 1819, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for the purposes following, namely: two-fifths to be disbursed, under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading to the State; the residue to be appropriated, by the Legislature of the State, for the encouragement of learning, of which one-sixth part shall be exclusively bestowed on a college or university.

Fourth. That thirty-six sections—

Besides the sixteenth section, mark you—

That thirty-six sections, or one entire township, which shall be designated by the President of the United States, together with the one heretofore reserved for the purpose, shall be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature of the said State, to be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by the said Legislature.

Now, there is every proposition, varying somewhat in amount but very little, and varying in language only to a small extent, that you find in this bill. Yet the Senator from California on my right [Mr. HAGER] says that when he read this bill he was perfectly astounded. His astonishment must have been very great. If he had read the precedents that are found in the statutes of the United States he would have known that these conditions apply to nearly every State that has ever been admitted into this Union, and that this bill is almost a verbatim copy in these respects of the bill that admitted Nebraska into the Union.

It does seem to me that the objections which are made to this bill are objections, however they might be considered well taken, which amount in effect to nothing, as I have shown in regard to mineral lands and the conditions which have been imposed in the admission of every State in this Union in reference to reservations for certain purposes.

I admit that in the admission of Illinois the 5 per cent. was only allowed on the sale of lands subsequent to the admission of the State; but, as I said before, I cannot see the distinction in principle. I do not understand that there is a distinction, so far as the principle is concerned, between paying 5 per cent. on money received and on money to be received. I cannot understand a difference in principle to save my life.

For these reasons which I have briefly given I propose to vote against these amendments; and for the other reason, as I said, that I think they may endanger the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I propose to perfect the bill if I can, by offering amendments that will make the bill such that there will be some protection to the people of Colorado after it is passed, and prior to that I propose to perfect the bill so as to protect the United States Treasury. There is a great difference between making up an account for the last ten years for the sale of public lands in the past and paying in the future, although the Senator says he does not see any difference in principle. So far as the future is concerned, we shall have the money coming in and we can make such disposal of it as we see fit. So far as the past is concerned, we simply create a debt. It is well known that the Treasury is not overburdened, and if we count up two or three hundred thousand dollars due that Territory, we have got to take it out of funds not coming in, which may be diverted to that purpose, but out of the Treasury. I do not think it is just to the Government. I put it on that ground. We have been paying the expenses of this Territory for many years past, nursing it along, paying the mileage and salaries of members of its Legislature and other officers, and I do not think it is just that we should be required now to pay this amount.

But the principal objection I have to this bill as it now stands is that it strikes away every guard around the rights of the miners of Colorado. They have simply taken a law which relates to an agricultural State like Nebraska, and put that on here without discrimination, which I must say the Mining Committee of the Senate never would have done in regard to a Territory which is mixed—mineral and agricultural—and more important in mining than in agriculture. In my State it would work disastrously, and I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to this case, that such a provision as I designed to propose to this bill and as my colleague proposes would save great disaster and great injustice. That reserves the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections where they are mineral lands from passing to the State. There is no such guard in this bill where the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections are given, nor in the thirty-two thousand acres given for erecting public buildings, nor in the forty-six thousand given for a State university, nor in the thirty-eight hundred and forty given in connection with the salt springs. I do not object to any of those grants except that they are very large in this age of the world when we are endeavoring to secure the disposition of all other lands for homestead purposes. I say with all of that and with the forty-six thousand and eighty acres given for purposes of internal improvement and the thirty-two thousand acres given for a State prison and the thirty-two thousand given for other public buildings, not one of these acres is protected, if it is mineral, from seizure by speculators who may get the State title surreptitiously or by superior inducements that they can hold out in the same manner that there was an attempt made to grab the Keystone Mine in California, which had been in the possession of men who had developed it for a dozen years. By the ultimate decision of the courts that question was soon put at rest and that exception saved; and if that had not been so, if we could not have established the principle in the courts, by the Land Office saving that mine, hundreds of mines in the State of California situated on the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections would have gone in just the same way, and our miners would have been robbed and would have lost their possessions. That is an illustration. In that case I took a personal interest, contrary to my usual habit of not interfering in matters before the Departments. I went without fee or reward and protested against the injustice of any other decision than this saving construction of that law, and followed it by a written protest which I put on file there, and which remains to this day, against overruling that exception in favor of speculators. I say in view of that recent experience not two years gone now, I stand here to protest against turning over the miners of Colorado to the injustice which would arise provided that exception was left out of this bill.

Now, as I have said repeatedly, the only question is whether we shall go back to this accounting during the time we have kept this Territory at our own expense. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that, and I hope we shall have the vote.

Mr. PRATT. The pending proposition, I understand, of the Senator from California is about section 12, so that 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Colorado shall be paid over hereafter to the State, and not 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales which have accrued heretofore. If that is the nature of the amendment, I propose to address to the Senate a few observations upon that point.

I have been curious to examine the earlier precedents upon that subject. I have before me the several enabling acts under which the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois were admitted into the Union, and I find that in every case the provision is explicit that the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales should be paid over to the new State at some day subsequent to the passage of the enabling act. Take, for instance, the case of Ohio, which was admitted into the Union in 1802. The condition there was—

That one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State sold by Congress from and after the 30th day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, &c.

The provision in the enabling act under which the State of Illinois was admitted into the Union is similar in its terms. The third condition is—

That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying within such State, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the 1st day of January, 1819, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for the purposes following.

The enabling act under which Illinois became a State was passed on the 18th of April, 1818. These proceeds were to be paid over to that State from and after the 1st day of January, 1819. Now I turn to the case of Indiana. Indiana was admitted under an enabling act passed by Congress on the 19th of April, 1816; and it is provided in the first section—

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Indiana be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper; and the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Then it provides certain conditions. Section 6 provides:

That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the convention of the said Territory of Indiana, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States, &c.

Then comes the provision to which I wish to refer. The third condition is:

That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said Territory, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the 1st day of December next—after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof, and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State under the direction of Congress.

That is, the 1st day of December, 1816—

I have not had time to pursue the precedents any further. But in these three great States express provision was made, as will be seen by what I have read, that the proceeds were to be paid over only as they should come into the Treasury at a date subsequent to the admission of the State into the Union. Now, why should not this rule apply to Colorado and apply to her with much greater force than it applied to these States because I do not see any provision in this bill similar to that which was incorporated into those several enabling acts admitting Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois to the Union? They were allowed these proceeds in consideration that they would, by an ordinance irrevocable, provide that none of the lands belonging to the United States should be taxed for the period of five years after their sale. That provision was carried into every enabling act under which the States which are now old but which were young States then were admitted into this Union. They were allowed this percentage on these proceeds because they relinquished to the United States for the term of five years after the lands were sold the power of taxation. If there is any similar provision in this bill providing for the admission of Colorado into the Union, I have been unable to find it. I trust my honorable friend from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will point it out if there is. After this motion shall have been disposed of, I shall move to strike out this entire section. I am unable to perceive any reason whatever why any of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Colorado should be paid over to her after her admission as a State. I inquire what reason there is, what precedent there is why these proceeds should be paid over when she gives no equivalent in the shape of a release from taxation of the lands of the United States for the period of five years.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, in the State of Maine it was once the law, if it is not now, that when a young man arrived at the fixed age of twenty-one years he was emancipated from the control of his father, and had the right to direct his own exertions and to appropriate the proceeds of his own exertions. I knew in that State once a very rich and a very parsimonious man who had but one son, not a good many, only one; and one day he became twenty-one years of age, and by the law of the State he was entitled to his own time and the proceeds of his own efforts thereafter. His father insisted, however, that he should enter into that estate only upon the condition that he should take with him one cow and take possession of a tract of pine barrens upon which the grasshoppers which visited Nebraska and Kansas the last summer would have despised themselves if they could have thought of settling for a moment. The young man in obedience to parental authority took his cow and took possession of the lot, and you will not be surprised to hear that in a very few years he committed suicide. [Laughter.]

We have no general law which determines when our children, the children of the Republic, shall become of age and shall have the right to set up for themselves. We have been in the habit of fixing that time as each individual child came forward to claim it. Another child is here to-day asking to be emancipated from the parental authority, so to speak, of the United States, willing still to be a child, but wanting, like other emancipated children, the right to guide herself. My own judgment is that we ought to confer that right upon the people of Colorado or withhold it, one of the two. If we give it, I think we had better give it in a generous, cordial, decent, fatherly, if not motherly way; not cuff their ears and tell them to go, nor kick them and tell them to go. If we withhold it, withhold it altogether.

I have but one test by which to judge for myself when this thing we call a State ought to be admitted or not. Whenever I find a community friendly to the United States and able to pay the expenses of their own government, defray the charges of their own control, if they say they are willing to do it, I am not the man to forbid them. If my own judgment is not quite in accord with theirs, if I find a pretty spirited and a pretty plucky people saying that they are equal to the work of self-government, when I am not quite satisfied of the fact myself, I rather yield my own opinions to theirs. I would rather encourage a little ambition of this kind than discourage it. But whenever a case of that kind comes, if the point on which you hesitate is whether they are really equal to defraying their own charges or not, that is not the people for you to drive a hard bargain with, but be a little generous, be a little liberal with that people if you are going to be with any.

Now, we stand here disputing at this present time whether we will pay to the State of Colorado 5 per cent. of the proceeds of all the public lands which have been or may be hereafter disposed of within her limits, or only 5 per cent. upon such proceeds as may be derived hereafter. The precedents are both ways. The great majority of precedents are, as has been stated by the Senator from Indiana, in favor of paying the 5 per cent. on the future sales. That was done as he says with Ohio; that was done with Illinois; that was done with Indiana; that was done with Wisconsin; that was done with Iowa; that was not done with Minnesota. The precedents are both ways. All I can say about it is that the difference is not probably $5,000 in the case of Colorado; I do not know that it is a thousand dollars, I really do not know at all what it is. We stood here the other day and voted $10,000, a free gift, to educate whom? The children of certain Indian tribes not any more nearly related to us, not any more nearly related to the best of us, than these people in Colorado.

Mr. SARGENT. My impression is that the Senate struck that out.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir. We had a pretty tight struggle to prevent it being voted at $30,000. I believe we did prevent that, but the $10,000 we adhered to.

Mr. HAGER. The record says it was stricken out.

Mr. HOWE. The $10,000? That was not my recollection.

Mr. HAGER. I asked the question of the Chair, and the Chair said it would be stricken out if the amendment then moved prevailed, and it did prevail.

Mr. HOWE. My recollection is so very distinct that I do not think I can be mistaken; but if I am mistaken, then we are $10,000 better off, and can so much the better afford to do justice to Colorado.

The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] however, makes a point which I should like to have attended to, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will explain that. It is true, as the Senator from Indiana says, that in every instance these grants of land or these grants of money have been made to these Territories as the equivalent for certain conditions imposed upon the Territory for admission as a State, fundamental conditions. I never thought there was a great deal of value in these conditions, though there is some, perhaps. I should really hope it would be explained why these conditions are left out. I shall vote, however, against the pending amendment. I shall vote for 5 per cent. on the proceeds of lands already sold, as well as lands hereafter to be sold.

Mr. PRATT. Before my friend from Wisconsin takes his seat I will read to him the clause to which I referred; it is the same in Ohio and Illinois that it is in the enabling act by which Indiana was admitted into the Union:

And provided always, That the five foregoing provisions herein offered are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by the United States from and after the 1st day of December next shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by order or under any authority of the State, whether for State, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, and we do not mean to take the State in at all without imposing those conditions; but I want to suggest to my friend that he will not meet the difficulty if he leaves the conditions out and takes compensation by refusing the 5 per cent. and the other grants of land. Striking them out does not make the omission any less objectionable. The conditions should go in and these provisions should not be stricken out.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, on the subject of this 5 per cent. fund——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Nebraska give way? I should like to make a request of his colleague that he waive further opposition to this amendment. This amendment, and two or three others, several Senators desire to make, and I think we shall get along better with the bill if these amendments are consented to without further opposition.

Mr. TIPTON. I propose to make the statement with which I commenced. The explanation given by the Senator from Indiana to the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the commencement of the custom of paying 5 per cent. to States on the sales of lands I think is accurate. It was in order to make some compensation to the State, from the fact that the State was not able for five years to derive any revenue from the lands thus sold. Now, in regard to the new States, we are not able to derive any revenue from the lands sold by the General Government to individuals, or rather to those who are homesteaders, for the space of at least about seven years. This 5 per cent. has been given to the State of Nebraska on all lands sold before it was admitted as well as on all the lands since sold, and it is also a fact in regard to our legislation that in order to draw a larger amount into our new State treasuries from the 5 per cent. fund an act was passed in the case of the admission of the State of Alabama, and it was extended to the State of Mississippi in 1857, and extended to other States in the Union afterward, allowing all the unsold Indian reservations within a State to be estimated as lands already sold at $1.25 an acre; and on this estimate of Indian reservations before ever they were sold State after State has received thousands and tens of thousands of dollars from the General Government as a 5 per cent. fund. I am not certain that Nebraska has ever received more than perhaps twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars—I cannot be exact as to the amount—from this 5 per cent. fund; but I do know that we felt that we are entitled to $60,000 recently by estimating our Indian reservations as though they could be included also as lands sold. We went to the Treasury Department, and I think our claim was allowed until it reached the Comptroller. The Comptroller set it aside, and we are now seeking by legislation to have the privilege of taking from the Treasury of the United States $60,000 on account of Indian reservations which have not been sold, and we can only do it by having the act which was passed for the benefit of Mississippi extended to the State of Nebraska, as she was not a State at the time that act was passed.

So, then, the history of this 5 per cent. fund is before the Senate, commencing with it as given to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio; then extended to some of the other States, and given to Nebraska on the sale of lands before she was admitted as well as on the sale of lands subsequently, and then the extension of an act to the States of the Union allowing them to estimate their Indian reservations as though they had been also sold at $1.25 an acre and giving them 5 per cent. on such sales. I leave the history of the 5 per cent. fund with the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator from Nebraska who has the bill in charge [Mr. HITHCOCK] to withdraw opposition to this amendment and let it be adopted. It cannot injure the bill, and I am inclined to think it will be more satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So far as the amendment itself is concerned, I have no particular objection, as I stated before, to its adoption. It amounts in the aggregate to a very small sum. The precedents which have been quoted here in regard to the matter are correct, because the earlier acts were less liberal than the later ones. States admitted years ago did not receive 5 per cent. on the proceeds of lands sold prior to their admission. States recently admitted have received it. My own State has received it. It amounts, however, as I said before, to a very small sum, and Colorado is abundantly able to pay her own expenses without this 5 per cent. It will be a conspicuous example of economy on the part of the Senate of the United States if they save four or five thousand dollars in the case of Colorado; and so far as that in itself is concerned I have no objection; but as I said before, I have objection to any amendment. I desire if possible to prevent any amendment being adopted for the reason that I believe it will peril the passage of the bill, and I sincerely and earnestly desire the passage of the bill, and so I shall ask for a vote upon this amendment. And I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. SARGENT. I can assure the Senator that he makes a great mistake. It will take a long while to pass this bill, provided the Senator who has it in charge and the particular friends of the bill insist that it shall pass without amendment. We propose amendments which we can defend upon principle; we bring forward precedents establishing their correctness; and the Senator does not object to the correctness of the amendments, but stating that he has no objection to them intrinsically, will not allow the bill to be amended. That is not legislation. If the Senator desires to oppose the amendments on any legitimate principle which he may suggest, that is another proposition; but when he simply stands here and says, "This bill shall not be amended, no matter what reasons may be given," then I assure him it will take a very long while to pass his bill. I should be sorry to take up the time of the Senate, but I think after a recent exercise of my wings in that direction, I can take a little while on the bill if it be necessary to prevent its passage in a form disastrous either to the Treasury or to the people of Colorado.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no desire of course to prevent the adoption of this amendment provided a majority of the Senate so will. I expect, as I trust the honorable Senator from California expects, to be governed by the will of the majority in that regard. If a majority of the Senate vote to amend the bill in this particular, I certainly shall bow to that decision. I desire simply a vote upon this amendment; and that I believe is the ordinary course of legislation.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, let us have a vote.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I desire to say a word upon this amendment. If I understand the section proposed to be amended, it is to pay over moneys already collected by the United States from the sale of its lands in this Territory to the State of Colorado when admitted. Those moneys have been spent. Under the bill, the moment this bill is passed we owe to the State of Colorado this amount of money, whatever it may be. That is against every precedent which has hitherto obtained, with one exception. In the case of Nebraska I am told that was done; and that I presume was an oversight. Not only is it dangerous in that respect, but may not some States begin to look around for claims against this Government? Are they not continually doing it? We know that percentages from sales of public lands are now claimed by Indiana and other States, and the question is still in controversy. So there are demands for claims as to arms. When these claims have been disposed of, will not those States come back and say "You have been voting money to Nebraska and to Colorado, to all future States that come into the Union as a percentage on lands sold prior to their establishment as States, and we are entitled equitably to the same?" Such claims will be pressed by agents in the different States, for it is not the States that are here generally but the agents who are interested in getting up these claims for States, who receive large percentages for the collection of these claims and get Legislatures to send them here. They can stand before this body and before the country upon the principle "you have given to other States, and why shall not we have it?"

Mr. President, I am opposed to it because it is the creation of a debt. The money has been paid into the Treasury and we have got to go there to take it out; and besides it is establishing a principle upon which other States may in the future come upon us with claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it is in order to do so, on consultation with the friends of the bill I am of the opinion that possibly it may facilitate the speedy passage of the bill through the Senate or a speedy vote upon the bill if this amendment is agreed to; and against my own judgment, against my own feelings, I have decided so far as I am concerned, if it is in order, to withdraw any opposition to it.

Mr. SARGENT. With that disposition of the amendment, I am willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. With the consent of the Senate the call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of the call for the yeas and nays. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following as a proviso to section 12:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any lands disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States, or to any lands now or hereafter reserved for public uses.

I desire to say only a word or two in reference to the amendment. When I was up before, I outlined my purpose in stating that I would offer such an amendment, and I believe it covers the ground which I proposed. The remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] since that time give me an illustration of my idea. I understand that his State has made or proposes to make a claim for $60,000 for lands which are reserved by the United States as Indian reservations, on the ground that if the United States reserves them instead of selling them, the 5 per cent. should go to the State in any event. The Senator assents that that is correct. I want to exclude that exclusion for the future at any rate, and if we have Indian reservations in the State of Colorado, I do not want to have to pay 5 per cent. of a valuation on them to the State for the privilege of holding them. Furthermore, as we are pretty liberal now under the homestead law, and large amounts of land are taken up under it which formerly were not, I do not want to have to pay 5 per cent. on the assessed valuation of those lands under this section to the State of Colorado or any other State that may hereafter come in, or to any State now in the Union. To exclude these conclusions I offer this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "public" the words "or other;" so as to read "public or other uses." I am doubtful whether the words "public uses" would cover an Indian reservation or various other reservations that might be named.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I have one more amendment to offer to this section. After the words "sales of" in line 2, I move to insert "agricultural;" so as to read "that 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of agricultural lands." The percentage has only hitherto been applied to the proceeds of the sales of agricultural land, and I want that word inserted. This of course does not cover the reservation or the subject which is covered by the amendment of my colleague in reference to mineral lands. I had drawn an amendment relating to that subject, but I think his is better than mine, and I will not offer any amendment on that matter, leaving it to him to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I now offer the amendment which I before sent to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to insert as an additional section—

That all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation and grants of this act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That amendment is already covered by the amendment submitted by the other Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend section 3, lines 22 and 23, by striking out the words "from the passage of this act," and inserting the words "next after the 1st day of September, 1875;" so as to read:

Which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days next after the 1st day of September, 1875.

The object of this amendment, with one or two others which I shall offer in the same connection, is to give the people of the Territory a considerable space of time between the passage of this act and the issuing of a proclamation for the election of members of a constitutional convention, in order that this most important act which the people in this Territory can ever perform will have undergone public discussion for a period long enough to have public opinion take a definite shape.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the same connection and to carry out the same idea, in section 5, line 16, I move to insert after the word "held" in line 6 the words "in the month of July, 1876;" so that it will read, "for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held in the month of July, 1876;" thus fixing the month within which the election ratifying the constitution shall be held.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It is simply postponing the admission of Colorado to some time in the year 1876 at least. I understand the object of the Senator's amendment is to postpone the election for the ratification of the constitution to July, 1876.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe that Colorado is entitled to admission now. I believe she is entitled to admission upon every consideration of right. I believe there are there a sufficient number of American citizens to be entitled to representation and admission as a sovereign State. The object of this amendment is to postpone their admission to some future and indefinite time. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably there is not any great object in the Senator from Nebraska or myself making speeches about these questions. There are very few Senators present; but to those who are present, I will say that I think this is a very important amendment; and it is that after this convention shall have been called, as we have now agreed, in September, 1875, and shall have met therefore in the winter of 1875–'76 and submitted their constitution to the people, that there may intervene a space of five or six months between the time when the constitution is agreed to by the convention and the time when the people are called upon to vote on it. I think that in most of the older States, I think in most of the newer ones, according to their constitutions, regulations exist for a considerable space of time between the proposal of a constitution or an amendment to a constitution by a convention to the people and the time when the people are called upon to vote on it, in order that every citizen of the community may have ample time to study the fundamental and most important instrument that can exist in a State and to vote upon it intelligently. That is all there is to it; and inasmuch as this amendment only gives at the most six months, and probably in fact not more than four or five, it appears to me that it is of great importance to this people that their first fundamental law should be made sufficiently familar to them that they may understand perfectly what they are voting for as the fundamental law of their State.

The question being put on the amendment, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Washburn, and Windom—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, and West—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I wish to offer an amendment to section 8, line 5, after the words "Legislature thereof," to insert "with the approval of the President."

As the bill now reads in section 8 certain land is "to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof." I wish to add "with the approval of the President," so that it will require the approval of the Department here. I think, as it relates to the public domain, we ought not to delegate this power of selection and location without reserving some control in the Department; and I understand it has been the practice hitherto that these locations shall be made with the approval of the President, which of course would throw it to the Department, that the Department may know what is going on. I think that is perfectly right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. To carry out the same purpose, in section 9, line 2, after the word "location," I move to insert "and with the approval as aforesaid;" so as to read:

That fifty other entire sections of land as aforesaid, to be selected and located and with the approval as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted, &c.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. Now, in section 10, line 3, after the word "selected," I move to insert "and approved," so as to read "to be selected and approved in the manner aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. In section 11, on line 3, I move to strike out the word "or" and insert "and," so as to read "with six sections of land adjoining and as contiguous as may be to each," instead of "or contiguous."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Has any change been made in the thirteenth section of the bill as it was originally printed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The Chair understands that no change has been made.

Mr. INGALLS. That section refers to a chapter and section of a statute that has no longer existence. I move to strike out all after "that" in the first line down to and including the words "eighteen hundred and forty-one" in the fourth line, and insert:

Section 2378 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The reason for making the change is that the statute referred to in the bill has been repealed and the provision of the section referred to is now incorporated in section 2378 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. The Revised Statutes have as yet been furnished to very few members of the Senate; and I ask the Senator from Kansas to be kind enough to explain what is the effect of this amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The effect of the amendment is simply to apply the provision of the eighth section of the act of the 4th of September, 1841, to the State of Colorado, the original act having been repealed and the section to which this refers having been incorporated in the Revised Statutes, which is now numbered section 2378.

Mr. PRATT. Please read that section.

Mr. INGALLS. It reads as follows:

There is granted for purposes of internal improvement to each new State hereafter admitted into the Union, upon such admission, so much public land as, including the quantity that was granted to such State before its admission and while under a territorial government, will make five hundred thousand acres.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to understand what was the matter referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I move now to strike out section 12, which provides for the giving of 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Colorado to that State. I wish to take the sense of the Senate upon that proposition. This bill goes beyond all other bills granting lands to new States. For example, section 7 gives the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of land in every township for the benefit of common schools; section 8 gives to the State fifty sections of the public domain for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of the State for legislative and judicial purposes; section 9 gives to the State fifty sections of land for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary. Is there any precedent for that?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. PRATT. In what State?

Mr. LOGAN. Nebraska.

Mr. PRATT. The precedent is of a very recent date.

Mr. LOGAN. Kansas, too, I think.

Mr. PRATT. Section 10 gives to this new State seventy-two sections of land to be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university. That is an old provision, I admit. Section 11 gives to this State seventy-two sections of land contiguous to salt springs. The earlier legislation was simply to give the salt springs themselves to the States, to be leased by them.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that although the bill allowing Illinois to be admitted into the Union did not expressly provide the number of acres of land granted for that purpose, yet an act of Congress prior to that set apart lands at the salt springs in Illinois, and at Shawneetown and at Brownsville there were very large bodies of land set apart with those salt springs; I do not remember the number of acres. Afterward, Congress some years ago—I introduced the bill myself—transferred the land to the State, and by an act of the Legislature the land was surveyed and sold. I do not remember the number of acres, but there was a very large tract of land accompanying each one of the salt springs reserved.

Mr. PRATT. I am not objecting to these bountiful provisions in the way of public lands; but I am objecting to the proposition that in addition to all of these large grants, some of them it seems to me unusual, to the State of Colorado we should also give to that State, which I understand from the statement of the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this morning contains an area three or four times as large as the State of Indiana, the twentieth part of the proceeds of all the public lands to be sold hereafter within that State.

What equivalent is reserved by this bill to the United States for these liberal grants? Heretofore, as I endeavored to show when I was up before, there was in every enabling act, in consideration of these various bestowments, a provision that the new State should abstain from taxing the lands of the United States for the period of five years after their sale. That was a provision inserted in all the enabling acts, for the purpose of promoting the early settlement of those States and inducing men to invest their money in the purchase of the public lands. That was the equivalent, and it was a great equivalent, which the United States received in return for these large bestowments. But there is nothing of that sort reserved in this bill. All of these lands and the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the lands to be hereafter sold are bestowed upon the State without her rendering any equivalent whatever according to the earlier legislation in like cases.

I think this new State ought to be contented with these liberal bestowments of the public lands without asking that a twentieth part of the proceeds of all the large public domain within her limits that shall hereafter be sold shall be paid into her treasury for the purposes of internal improvement. If I remember aright, the Government has been very liberal with this Territory heretofore in the way of subsidies for building a great railroad that runs into the Territory from Missouri. But in addition to that you are to give 5 per cent. of the proceeds of all the lands hereafter to be sold, let those sales be large or little. It is not likely that the amount will be very large under our present pre-emption and homestead system; but what I object to is the principle. It is an entire departure from the earlier legislation. Similar grants were made to Ohio, to Indiana, to Illinois, to Alabama, to Mississippi, and to Missouri, in consideration of the fact that they would abstain when they became States from taxing the public lands for five years after they were sold; and there is no similar provision in this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will state in a single moment the difference between the situation of the public lands and the method of obtaining the public lands in Colorado and the method of obtaining public lands in olden times in Indiana and in Illinois, to which the Senator alludes. At that time any person could enter public lands by paying his $1.25 per acre and could obtain title thereto. At the present day in the Territory of Colorado the only method of obtaining title to public agricultural lands is by pre-emption or homestead, and mostly under the homestead law. By the provisions of that law a man is unable to obtain his title from the United States for the period of five years; and during those five years, although the State government is at the expense of maintaining law and order and sustaining government there, the State is not able under the law to tax this land. For that reason there is a propriety in allowing this 5 per cent. to States admitted now which did not exist at the time of the admission of Indiana and Illinois.

One thing more in answer to the Senator. He stated that the Government had been very liberal in subsidies to railroads within this Territory. I have to say to the honorable Senator that there are now running and completed within the limits of the Territory of Colorado seven hundred and thirty-five miles of railroad, and not one mile of it has received a money subsidy from this Government and only two hundred and fifty miles ever received any land from this Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask the Senator from Nebraska whether there is in this bill, as I have not examined it, any provision that the lands of the United States shall for five years be exempt from taxation by the State?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No such provision is necessary, because the lands are exempt not only for five years but for fifty years, so long as the United States holds them.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator forgets the point that I made. The earlier enabling acts provided that this exemption from taxation should exist for the period of five years after the Government had sold the lands. That was the point I made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will read the language of the provision:

Provided, That the foregoing propositions are offered on the condition that by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States the State shall provide that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, or township, or any other purpose, for the term of five years after the day of sale.

That provision is in all the acts creating the States from the time of Ohio down to the present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does that provision exist in recent acts for the admission of recent States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. For the admission of all the States down to the time that Missouri was admitted, as I know from an examination of them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I said before, that provision did exist and was proper perhaps then; but now after settlement is made on the lands, after a man goes and takes a homestead upon the lands, he does not obtain title for the space of five years; and for that reason there is eminent propriety in the 5 per cent. being given to the State, because while it is compelled to maintain law and order and protect that settler, it is unable to tax his land.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to strike out the twelfth section as amended.

Mr. MORTON. It strikes me that on this point the Senator from Nebraska is right, although I agreed with my colleague when he first made his point. The enabling act of Indiana provided that 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of lands made after her admission should be given to the State upon the condition that the land sold by the United States should not be taxed for five years. Then there was no homestead law and the lands were all sold. Now the settler locates upon the land and at the end of five years he gets his patent and then the land is taxed, so that the result is about the same, that for five years the lands are not taxable in either case. I think that is a good answer as to such of the lands as are settled upon under the homestead law.

Mr. LOGAN. But if these five years are added, it will be ten years before they can be taxed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to strike out the twelfth section.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 9, noes 30.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out section 13. The thirteenth section provides:

That the eighth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights," approved the 4th day of September, 1841, shall be and is hereby declared applicable to the State of Colorado when admitted into the Union as herein provided.

I find on looking at the eighth section of the act of the 4th of September, 1841, that it provides:

That there shall be granted to each State specified in the first section of this act five hundred thousand acres of land for the purposes of internal improvement.

And it then proceeds to provide how these acres shall be selected, &c., which I will not take the time of the Senate to read. The States named in the act of 1841 are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Michigan. The effect of this section, then, is to give to the State of Colorado five hundred thousand acres for purposes of internal improvement. Lands in Colorado which are fit for agricultural purposes are somewhat scant, as we all know. The grants of lands made to the recent States have not included this eighth section of the act of 1841; and when we admitted the State of Nebraska, which I take for an example, and which I feel somewhat sure will have force with my friend from Nebraska who has charge of this bill, we did not give, so far as I have been able to observe in reading the act, these five hundred thousand acres of land to Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But you did give it by a supplemental act afterward.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know that; but I can well imagine, in the scramble for public lands that took place about the years 1864, 1865, and 1866, and which has swamped the public-land system of the United States, that something of that kind could have been done; but in the original and well-considered act that was not provided for. Besides, there have been granted to railroad corporations lands in the Territory of Colorado which have been devoted to public improvements to a very large amount. So that the case does not stand as it stood in respect to all these earlier States through which, when they were admitted, railroads had not been projected and had not received land grants; but it stands in the attitude of a people whose internal improvements by large grants of land have already been provided for. Then, if we now add to what we have already given for purposes of internal improvement in Colorado five hundred thousand acres more of land, we shall be doing more for Colorado than we did for the States named in the act of 1841. I think that is unjust. I think if this people is strong and rich, as it is said to be, and I believe it, they are able to take care of themselves, and if they have already received all the benefits of internal improvements through railways built out of the aid of the Government, either in bonds or in lands, it is not just to say that the land of the people to the extent of five hundred thousand acres shall be taken in addition and given to them on the old theory which applied to States where internal improvements had not yet been begun and carried on. This is my motive for moving to strike out this section.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have but a word to say on this amendment. By the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2378, it is provided:

There is granted, for purposes of internal improvement, to each new State hereafter admitted into the Union, upon such admission, so much public land as, including the quantity that was granted to such State before its admission and while under a territorial government, will make five hundred thousand acres.

Now, if it is the desire of the Senate, on the ground that Colorado is able to get along without it, to make Colorado an exception, I submit; but I think it is very remarkable economy, and I trust it is an exhibition of economy that the Senate will not at the present time make.

Mr. STEWART. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. It would be making an exception against Colorado that has not been made against any Western State since the first act was passed. They have all had this grant, and in Nevada it was specially beneficial. The Legislature of that State asked that it might be diverted to common schools, and we got the consent of Congress, and those lands have been sold and we have a nice common-school fund from them, and it has been of great service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not come under the head of "internal improvements."

Mr. STEWART. No; but we diverted it to that purpose with the consent of Congress. We have the finest common-school fund there of any State in the Union of its size. I hope that Colorado will have it and that she will do as well with it as Nevada has done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Nebraska has referred me to section 2378 of the Revised Statutes. It declares:

There is granted, for purposes of internal improvement, to each new State hereafter admitted into the Union, upon such admission, so much public land as, including the quantity that was granted to such State before its admission and while under a territorial government, will make five hundred thousand acres.

So that if you keep this section in the bill the State of Colorado will receive under the bill, first five hundred thousand acres of land for internal improvements specifically under the act of 1841; she will then under the Revised Statutes receive five hundred thousand acres of land to be disposed of as she pleases to dispose of them. Does the Senate mean to say she is going to get a million acres of land?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the honorable Senator was not present when the bill was amended in that respect a few moments ago referring to this very section of the Revised Statutes. That section has already been amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which section?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Section 13 in the bill, to which he alludes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me hear section 13 read as it now stands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator was not present at the time. I think he does not understand what action has been taken.

The SECRETARY. As amended, the section now reads:

That section 2378 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be, and is hereby, declared applicable to the State of Colorado when admitted into the Union as herein provided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. Then we have changed the phase of it from what I understood it to be. Now I have an observation to submit in moving to strike out the section as it now stands, which is just as strong to my mind as it was before, because when I made the motion I did not know of this section 2378. As it now stands we are to give five hundred thousand acres of land to the State of Colorado to dispose of as she pleases. She may sell that land and put the money into her general treasury and save taxing her people by that amount. It does not require that it shall be devoted to schools; it does not require that it shall be devoted to internal improvement; but it is an absolute, unconditional gift to that State of that much land. What has she got already in the bill? By the twelfth section she has 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to be devoted to the purposes of internal improvement. She has sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township for the support of common schools. She has fifty entire sections for the purpose of building a State-house, &c. She has fifty other sections for the purpose of a penitentiary. She has seventy-two other sections for the purpose of a university, and has, as I have said, 5 per cent. upon the sales of all the rest.

Now, then, if the United States are asked to give this people, who say that they are strong enough to be a State and take care of themselves, five hundred thousand acres more, amounting to a million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States, I should be glad to know the ground that it is put upon, except that it has been given to other States before. The argument of what has taken place hitherto is not very strong with me. I can remember the time, within my short service in this body, when every Senator had a corkscrew, a penknife, and a tooth-pick, and I do not know what else, given to him; but a republican Senate and House of Representatives, among all their other sins of that character, have cut off that sort of thing. So the argument that some other State in some other time has had given to her a million dollars, as a bonus on admission into the Union, has no force with me. We have provided liberally for this State, and we ought not to take a million dollars from the pockets of the people of the United States and put it in the pockets of the people of this Territory merely because they insist upon being made now a State.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator from Nebraska ought to consent to this section going out, because it amounts to nothing. The State gets the five hundred thousand acres under section 2378 of the Revised Statutes. Section 13, as it stands in the bill, simply extends to the State the benefit of that section, which is taken from the act of September, 1841, so that it makes no difference to the State whether this section is in or out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I consent to the amendment striking out the section.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very sorry the Senator has consented to it. I think we ought not to treat these new sisters we are bringing in differently from what we treated the rest. We are giving to her that which we can spare and which costs us nothing. Why should Colorado come here with a less patrimony than any of the other States in the Union? There is no reason for it at all. Who is there among all the older Senators who has daughters who get married who would not be glad to portion them with anything that they could spare themselves? It takes nothing from us. These lands we have given nothing for. They have never been anything to us except a cost; and why should we not give them to enable this new State to become as great and as powerful and as useful as any other State in the Union?

Colorado, if she is admitted at all, is going to have a great future. She is filled with minerals, has an immense territory which will always be unproductive, and probably great portions of this land we give to her now will be of no use at all. No man will go there to become a farmer. Very few will go there to become herdsmen. Most of her people will be miners and these lands, now worthless, if they ever become worth anything will be so because of the industry of the people who are induced to go there. We must give them greater inducements than we gave in Kansas, in Nebraska, in Ohio, in Indiana, and in Illinois, where every man can go and take up forty or eighty acres of land and make himself a fortune. The people who go there will have to endure hardships for long years. I would not only give them as much as any other Territory has had, but I would give them a great deal more.

I am not clearly satisfied about this bill; but if Colorado is to be brought into the Union, I would give her every opportunity to make herself as great as she can become.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assented to the amendment on the understanding that by the provisions in the Revised Statutes now Colorado would receive as other States have received. Therefore I am willing this section should be stricken out.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to say a word on the general subject of this bill. It has been my pleasure to have had considerable intercourse with citizens of Colorado, and so far as their general intelligence and character is concerned, certainly I know of no population for whose admission into the Union as a State I would more cheerfully vote, were there not other considerations to be taken into view in deciding that question. Coming now to the very question which has been under consideration as to the grant of lands which shall be made to this State, I wish to say in all candor that I think there are some things which ought to be considered in view of that question that I have not yet heard suggested. They may have been suggested when I was not in the Chamber.

The section of the Revised Statutes to which reference has already been made grants the five hundred thousand acres of land for purposes of internal improvement. They are not granted for general purposes, as has been stated by the Senator from Vermont, but all lands previously granted for purposes of internal improvement are required to be deducted in making up that account. Now what has the General Government done for Colorado heretofore in that direction? It is true the grant has not been made directly to the Territory, but there is the Kansas Pacific Railroad which runs a very considerable distance through the Territory of Colorado, to which was made not only a very large land grant but a subsidy in bonds by the Government. There is the Denver and Pacific Railroad which runs from Cheyenne down to Denver, the capital of the Territory and that also is a road to which a large land grant was made. Although these grants were made in name to the railroad companies, yet they were made for the purpose of the improvement of the Territory, just as effectually as if the grant had been made to the Territory itself. So that if we were to go into an adjustment of the rights of Colorado Territory with other Territories, and compare the question of how much one and how much the other has received, these land grants made to two railroad companies should be considered in adjusting that question.

If Colorado is to be admitted, I say with my colleague I wish her to come in as well provided for as any other Territory; but it is proper when more is asked than any other Territory has asked, if that is asked, that all the circumstances surrounding her admission should be considered. I deem it but fair to call the attention of the Senate to these facts that the land grants heretofore made to these railroads have inured to the benefit of Colorado Territory in her internal improvements just as effectually as if they had been granted to the Territory herself.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I know he did not intend it, but he stated in his remarks that not only a land grant but a subsidy in bonds had been given to these roads. He is mistaken in that. There was no bond subsidy attached to the railroad after it entered Colorado. It stopped at some other point, some fifty or sixty miles within the Kansas line.

Mr. SCOTT. I may be incorrect in stating that the bond subsidy extended over the whole line of the Kansas Pacific Railroad, but there was a subsidy to the Kansas Pacific Railroad.

Mr. LOGAN. It did not extend to Colorado; it was stopped by Congress. I was in the House at the time myself. They attempted to extend it after the line had been swung around, clear on through to Denver, but it was stopped at a point I do not remember now, but some miles inside of Kansas and did not extend to Colorado.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator speaks from recollection and is doubtless correct; but a land grant I say was given to the railroad in that Territory.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true. I am speaking of the bond subsidy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MORTON. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To strike out the thirteenth section.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there is no objection to striking that out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the Senator who has charge of this bill to consent to its going out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to meet the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania respecting the effect of section 2378 in respect to internal improvements I move the following amendment, to come in as a section in the place of the one just stricken out:

That section 2378 of the Revised Statutes shall, in its application to the State of Colorado, be so construed as to provide for the deduction from the amount of lands granted by said section of the amount of lands granted in any manner to aid works of internal improvement in any part of said Territory and State.

There is granted for purposes of internal improvement to each new State hereafter admitted into the Union, upon such admission, so much public land as (including the quantity that was granted to such State before its admission and while under a territorial government) will make five hundred thousand acres.

These land grants to aid internal improvements in that Territory which have taken effect, and under which the improvements have already been made, were not made to the Territory by name; they were made to railway and other corporations, but the Territory has had the solid benefit just as if they had been granted to the Territory directly, as in early times such grants were made to the Territory of Kansas, and so on, and then to the State of Kansas when it should come in, in aid of public improvements. It is a mere technical difference. The Territory and its people have received the benefit of these land grants, made on purpose to develop internal improvement in the Territory. Now, I think it is just, in order to put this Territory upon an equal footing with the States that have already received similar aid, that the lands which have been devoted to the building of internal improvements in the Territory although not granted directly to the Territory but turned over to some railway corporation, which have been granted to the corporation itself, should be deducted. My amendment, therefore, provides that in making this adjustment with the State of Colorado the lands that have been granted in that Territory for internal improvements in it—not out of it—shall be deducted in making up this five hundred thousand acres, which puts her upon the precise footing of the other States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 13 the following:

That section 2378 of the Revised Statutes shall in its application to the State of Colorado be so construed as to provide for the deduction from the amount of lands granted by said section of the amount of lands granted in any manner to aid works of internal improvements in any part of said Territory and State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall feel it my duty to resist that amendment, and I am sorry to take the time of the Senate in doing so, because I am very anxious to get a vote on this bill. As I said before, all we ask for Colorado is that you make the like appropriations for her that have been made in recent enabling acts for the admission of other new States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This does it exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is not treating her as other States recently admitted have been treated. As I said before, while there are seven hundred and thirty-five miles of railroad now completed and running within the limits of Colorado, there are but two hundred and fifty miles which have received a land grant from the General Government, and not one mile has ever received a bond subsidy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This amendment does not touch that part.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. While this amendment does not of course affect the roads that have received no subsidy, yet it does not place Colorado upon the same footing that other States have been placed. Nebraska, for instance, received her five hundred thousand acres of land, although the Union Pacific traverses her whole length from east to west, a distance of nearly five hundred miles. I trust that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say but a word in reference to this amendment. I ask the Senator from Vermont whether he intends by this amendment to include the lands that were donated by the General Government to the Union Pacific Railroad or that branch of it which runs through the Territory of Colorado?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I intend to include all lands in that Territory that have been given in aid of railroads in that Territory, although they were not, as the custom at first was, granted directly to the Territory for the purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I presumed that was the meaning of the amendment. If that is the meaning it would be much better, if the Senate intends to adopt this amendment, to provide that Colorado shall not have any land at all under this section in the Revised Statutes, because the Senator certainly is aware of the fact that the amount of land granted to that division of the Union Pacific Railroad running through Colorado amounts to over eight hundred thousand acres, nearly one million acres, and this provides that it shall be deducted from the five hundred thousand acres. Upon its face it looks as though Colorado was getting something, but the fact is that three hundred thousand acres more have been already donated to that railroad than would be allowed to Colorado under this section of the Revised Statutes. It does seem to me that that is a strange kind of legislation.

I believe in treating these new States as they come in as other States have been treated. Here is the State that I in part represent. After having had a donation of land, magnificent and grand, for the purpose of building the Central Railroad through that State from Cairo to Chicago and a branch to Galena, making seven hundred miles of railroad in that State taking the two branches together, granting them a large body of land, still under this statute the State of Illinois got the five hundred thousand acres of land. So with every other State in the Union that has land in it belonging to the Government. It does seem to me, after they have all received these grants and yet are entitled to the five hundred thousand acres under that statute, it is not fair to deprive Colorado when it comes in as a State from having the same rights that are given to every State in the Union having Government land within its boundaries.

I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I will not say it is a subterfuge, but it is a deception. It looks as though it was giving land to the State, when in fact three hundred thousand acres more than the statute gives have been already donated to one railroad.

Mr. STEWART. I hope this amendment will not be adopted or any amendment making a discrimination against Colorado after the precedent is thoroughly established. It does not look right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. LOGAN. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will carry the bill with it.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAGER. I would like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether it is customary to give 5 per cent. and then also five hundred thousand acres for internal improvements? Here in section 12 internal improvements are provided for. Section 13, as I understand, grants five hundred thousand acres more for the same purpose. I would ask whether there is any precedent for granting lands and then also giving the 5 per cent. upon sales? I am not very familiar with it, and I wish information.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. Every State has received the 5 per cent., and every State has received the five hundred thousand acres—not every State——

Mr. PRATT. Since 1841, when this law was passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of States admitted since the law was passed. But this statute is applicable to all the States having Government land within their borders. All that have Government land get it. Every State receiving donations of lands for the purpose of building a railroad, having Government lands, would receive this under this statute. Illinois will not get the five hundred thousand acres. Why? Because there is no Government land in the State; that is the reason. But I say every State having Government land gets it, and I say as to my own State it applies to it if it has Government land the same as to any other State. It does not get it because there is no Government land in the State. It applies to all States that have Government land, and they get the 5 per cent. besides.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Illinois I think is mistaken in one statement. It only applies to States admitted after the passage of the act. The act says:

There is granted for purposes of internal improvement to each new State hereafter admitted into the Union, &c.

Mr. HAGER. I was merely going to say that inasmuch as the Senate have refused to strike out section 12, it seems to me that section 13 ought to be stricken out, unless, as I said, it has been the custom to make both of these donations, the 5 per cent. and the five hundred thousand acres of land.

As I said when I was on the floor early in the morning, I am inclined to favor the passage of this bill, provided it gets into such shape as is not in conflict with previous legislation. I am not disposed to make a new precedent in this bill which must control hereafter. It does appear to me as if all the grants and donations that have hitherto been made to all territorial governments have been combined in this bill. While in one instance a Territory has had one and another one, it seems as if all were brought together in this bill. Now, I would ask if we are not going beyond what we ought to do in establishing a precedent for the future? If the bill is in such a shape as I think it ought to pass, I will vote for it, but I am under the impression that section 13 should be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must say one word in support of my amendment, in reply to the observations of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Illinois. In the case of Kansas I am quite sure that the land grants which were made were made directly to the Territory, to be used for purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator refer to the five hundred thousand acres?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I refer to the land grants in aid of railroads generally. But the Territory of Kansas, or the State of Kansas after she became a State, according to the section of the Revised Statutes which has been read, immediately turned over the land grants to railroads who would make these internal improvements. The object that Congress had in view was to aid the people of the Territories and new States in works of internal improvement. The method is a mere matter of incident. Whether the grant be made to the State or to the Territory in the first instance to be applied to building railroads, or whether it be made to the railroad company itself upon condition that it should build in the Territory or State, is of no consequence at all.

Now, when you apply that to the Territory of Colorado, what do you find? You find that by numerous land grants, made, it is true, not technically to the Territory by name, but for the same object that we granted to other Territories—that is, for railway works—we have given, instead of five hundred thousand acres, more than double that for the benefit of the people of the Territory of Colorado, and those lands have been disposed of and the works of internal improvement have been built. Now, the question is, that having been done, whether it is just to take from the people five hundred thousand acres of land more, in addition to what has already been given, and devote it to this purpose of internal improvement. Any Senator who thinks we ought to double the dose will vote against my amendment. Any Senator who thinks we ought not I think ought to vote in favor of it.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is not in harmony with the spirit of the section of the Revised Statutes, for this reason: That section provides for the off-set that may be made. The off-set is by excluding the quantity that was granted to such State before its admission and while under a territorial government. It provides that the set-off shall be such land as was granted to the Territory as such, to be administered by the Territory. This contemplates a grant of land of five hundred thousand acres, to be administered by the State for such improvements as in the judgment of the State ought to be made, deducting from it such as the Territory got, which the Territory as such administered according to its own discretion. Now, land granted to a railroad company was a thing over which the Territory had no control whatever. The Territory was not consulted about it. It was granted to the company to be controlled by the company and not by the Territory. Therefore such a grant does not come within the spirit of the section of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 22.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Pratt, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sprague, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pease, Ramsey, Schurz, Stewart, Tipton, and West—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Now that the material interests of this bill have been settled, I desire to draw the attention of the Senate to section 4. There are some things in that section which it appears to me ought not to be there. The first thing these people have to do after their organization is to "adopt the Constitution of the United States." As soon as the convention adopts the Constitution of the United States, then it is declared to be ready to proceed to business.

Here is the clause:

> And after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Here, I do. I think it was adopted long ago, as the Senator will agree, and prevails everywhere within the limits of the United States. It is at least inconsiderate legislation that we should be engaged seriously and as law-makers in putting stump speeches into bills of this kind. I take it for granted that this assembly is expected to know what they adopt when they adopt the Constitution of the United States. Probably there will be no trouble in this respect with it, but they have their own local affairs when they meet in convention to attend to besides examining the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Why put such a thing as that in a bill of this kind? They shall "adopt the Constitution of the United States." That is a mere matter of sentiment that cannot be practical and which cannot advance them toward the accomplishment of the purposes for which they are assembled, but it furthermore says after they have thus organized and thus adopted the Constitution of the United States then they are required to frame a constitution not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States nor to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. What is the use of requiring these untutored men, away out in that Territory, just now coming to manhood, to go into an examination of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, particularly when the very first principle of the Declaration of Independence teaches the very unpopular doctrine, that is at this day, the right of revolution and rebellion? It is a terrible doctrine, according to some gentlemen upon this floor and elsewhere. Is it not absurd legislation for gentlemen sitting here to ingraft a provision of this kind into a bill? It took George Washington and Benjamin Franklin and that class of men from early spring until the 17th day of September to come to a conclusion upon it, and here you want these people to adopt it before they can proceed to any other kind of business, and doing this they are then required to frame a constitution not repugnant to what they have just adopted, and still more this is to be done so as not to be repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to state to the Senator that because it took George Washington and his fellow-laborers so long and because they so carefully examined the subject, I think it very safe the people of Colorado should adopt it at once.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I regret we do not understand it here so as to follow it out as we should. We find it to be a great trouble at times in putting a construction upon it. Every one is ready to talk about the Constitution, and how soon to disagree as to its true meaning, and this is generally from the first day we meet in December to the end of the session. Is not such legislation as this absurd? I ask gentlemen why not strike it out? Let us think for a moment that they are American citizens, competent to attend to their own business, and that they will organize a government in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. Why enjoin these things upon them? To my mind it is absurd to address a people in such language whom we can well suppose know something; and if they know anything that fits them at all for free government, it is that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land.

But there is something more. It is provided in this same clause that—

> The constitution shall be republican in form and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed.

What has this people done? I ask my honorable friend whether he has been in the Territory of Colorado recently? They are to do what we have been quarreling over ever since I have been a member of the body; they are to have a civil-rights bill put in their organic law. They are required by this provision to do what you yourselves have not been able to do for the country to this day. By one provision in this bill you require the people to be put in a position that is not imposed upon twenty States of this Union. That is what you propose to do in this bill. Why the use of all this? Let the people of that Territory come into the Union and be upon equal terms with the original States. Force no reconstruction policy upon them as we have had upon States South—a policy wrong always, and surely not required as to these people. Let them form their constitution, and then let them be dealt with by the ordinary legislation of the country either as prescribed here or as prescribed at home. Now, you undertake in this very section to impose upon that people in a general provision every provision that you ever did attempt to incorporate in what is called a civil-rights bill.

And why now, I ask my honorable friends? Is it not almost time now to leave these distinctions out of your general laws? Why put in your bill and in every bill that is before us "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude"? It is about time to stop it, and to legislate for the American people, having no reference to words, or things, or distinctions of that kind, and then, whatever your ordinary legislation affects let it be affected generally, as it will be; unless it is found necessary upon special occasions to observe these distinctions, then name them, otherwise not. Why mention it? Is it not time, I ask you, Mr. President, to drop all that kind of legislation, so as not to be continually presenting to the public mind these distinctions? With equal propriety you can as well put these same distinctions into every bill you pass. It is time to stop it, in my judgment, and ought to be stopped here and now.

In this connection I would simply allude to the fact, for I do not design speaking at length—I only call the attention of the Senate to it—that there is no exception in respect to the Chinese. A friend sitting on this side of the Chamber has been for the last two weeks complaining about your Revised Statutes in omitting the word "white" in the naturalization laws, because he desired that that should remain in the statute in exclusion of the Chinese, so that they should be prevented from enjoying the privileges and immunities of other people in this country by reason of their being citizens of the United States. This provision makes no exclusion of them; and this Territory, or this State as it is to be, is close upon the confines of that civilization. There is no exclusion save "Indians not taxed."

My friend from California asks me to move an exclusion. No; I move no exclusion. I move to exclude from this bill all allusion to anything of the kind. Let the people of the Territory citizens of the United States make their own constitution, for I am satisfied that it will be republican in form and republican in substance; I am satisfied that those people will not depart from the principles of American liberty, but that they will, without our direction, conform generally to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, as well as they can understand them or apply them under the Constitution of the United States. If they do anything that is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, their act in that respect is simply and absolutely void and amounts to nothing. We can trust them as we trust the people in every other State in the Union; and we should not here undertake to direct those people as to the details of a constitution they are to make, because I take it for granted they know, if they know anything, that their State government must be republican in form, and I do not question but that it will be republican in substance.

Mr. PRATT. I move——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I thought I made a motion to strike out——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. PRATT. I move to add to section 12 the following proviso at the conclusion:

> Provided, however, That the aforesaid grants of public lands made in sections 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and the payment of said 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the said State, are made upon the condition that the convention of said State shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every tract of land sold by the United States from and after the 1st day of December next shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by or under any authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or other purposes, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Indiana one point for his notice. By the laws now it is five years before the persons occupying the land get title, and five years from that would make ten years. I am sure he does not want that, but that would be the effect of his amendment. They could not carry on the State government under it. There would be nothing to be taxed. I presume he means five years from the adoption of the constitution. The lands of homesteaders are exempt for five years. What would the State have to tax in order to carry on the State government?

Mr. PRATT. So far as the lands entered under the homestead law are concerned, this provision would not be applicable at all. It provides only for those lands that are sold by the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. But there cannot be any lands entered in that country except under the homestead law.

Mr. PRATT. Can they not be sold under the pre-emption law?

Mr. LOGAN. But under the homstead law it requires five years to make the title perfect.

Mr. PRATT. The meaning of the amendment is that it shall apply from and after the time the sale is made, whether it is made under the pre-emption law or not.

Mr. LOGAN. Still that would be construed to be from the time the Government gave the party a title.

Mr. PRATT. That is not the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I am satisfied the Senator did not intend that, but I think that will be the construction.

Mr. PRATT. I will submit to any modification to make that matter clear.

Mr. LOGAN. I submit to the Senator that the laws now are sufficient to prevent taxation for five years, because the lands are practically exempt from taxation for that time. The settlers cannot be taxed until they get their title, and to do that requires five years. His amendment would make it ten.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator is talking about lands which may be entered under the homestead law.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I of course am well aware that the title is not granted to homestead settlers until after the lapse of five years, but that is not the rule in relation to lands entered under the pre-emption laws. The pre-emptioners are not entitled to occupy and cultivate for five years before they can receive patents.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember the provisions of the pre-emption law; but the way nearly all the lands are taken up now is under the homestead law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I understand it, substantially the same result would be attained by this proviso as would have resulted had the Senate voted to strike out the provision which the honorable Senator from Indiana moved to strike out some time ago; that is, to provide that no lands shall be taxed by the State for five years after they have been disposed of by the United States. If that is the amendment of the honorable Senator, I desire to say, as I said before, that the reason why this amendment should not prevail is that most of the lands which are now entered are entered under the homestead law; that in accordance with the provisions of that law the settler is upon that land for five years before he obtains his title from the United States and before that land can be taxed. If in addition to these five years it is proposed to add another five years, it is proposing virtually to say that the government of the new State shall have nothing to tax and shall be unable to carry on the State government.

Mr. PRATT. My friend from Nebraska does not understand my proposition. This proposition does not reach any of the lands that are taken up under the homestead law. If they are taken under the homestead law, they are not sold. It applies only to such lands as are sold by the United States. In that case the same rule is applied to Colorado that was applied to Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and the other States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the honorable Senator aware of the fact that there is not one acre of land in Colorado that can be sold, under the present laws of the United States, for cash?

Mr. PRATT. I was not aware of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the fact. There is not one acre of public agricultural land in the State of Colorado that can be sold for cash. Under the law lands must first be offered at public sale, at auction, and no lands ever have been offered in that way, and consequently no lands are now open for entry in that way; and the only way they can be obtained is by homestead or pre-emption. Most of the lands are obtained under the homestead law, which requires five years to get a title; and the pre-emption laws require at least one year.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator has already answered measurably the question I was about putting to him: whether all lands that are taken up under the pre-emption law are not sold by the United States. Must they not be sold at at least $1.25 an acre under the existing pre-emption law? And, if so, why is it not right and reasonable to apply this rule to lands sold under the pre-emption law to the settler?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I said before, it requires at least one year for pre-emptors to obtain the title, and usually they are on the land two or three years. The entries under the pre-emption laws, as I said before, are very few; and furthermore, the House has passed a bill abolishing the pre-emption laws, and that bill has already been reported from the committee of which the honorable Senator is a member favorably, and that will entirely wipe out the pre-emption laws. Consequently there is no reasonable demand for this amendment. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it be agreeable to the Senate, I should like to have an executive session on necessary business for about ten minutes and then open the doors again and go on. I accordingly move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, not for the purpose of adjourning afterward, but only to do a little necessary business for a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.) The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We can soon dispose of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Vermont if he thinks an executive session is necessary now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not have moved it if I had not thought so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator whether on his responsibility he says that he thinks it necessary?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I decline to answer the Senator. I have stated already that I thought there was good reason for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator cannot answer a civil question, I will vote against his motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the question is very uncivil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 29, noes 17.

Mr. HITCHCOCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cameron, Conkling, Cooper, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, and Washburn—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, West, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Carpenter, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Morrill, of Maine, Oglesby, Patterson, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire now to say that after a vote is reached on this bill, which I hope will be reached very soon, and before I make a motion to take up the bill for the admission of New Mexico, which I intend to urge after this bill is disposed of, an opportunity will be afforded, and I shall be quite willing that an executive session shall then be had. I hope now we shall have a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Now I move my amendment in section 4, in line 12, to strike out from the word "provided."

Mr. BOGY. Let me suggest to the Senator that his amendment begin after the word "act," in line 7, down to the words "United States," in line 9. Let that be one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland will state his amendment.

Mr HAMILTON, of Maryland. In line 12 of section 4 I move to strike out all the words, including the word "provided" in that line, down to "Independence," in line 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that this amendment is to be followed logically, according to the speech of my honored friend from Maryland, by a proposition to strike out that part of the bill which provides that the people of Colorado shall adopt the Constitution of the United States. There could be nothing more appropriate than that the people of a Territory about becoming a State, or the people of the embryo State assembled in organic convention, should adopt the Constitution of the United States. There is not a State in the Union which has not adopted the Constitution of the United States. It is evidence of their loyalty thereafter to the Constitution of the United States that their first act of statehood is that they do adopt that Constitution. And their act in so adopting it is not strange or unnecessary, any more than is the oath which the Senator himself took at the desk of the Presiding Officer of this Chamber when he swore to support the Constitution of the United States; and that oath is taken over and over again, by every Senator who comes here, by every officer of the United States, no matter how humble may be the duties he performs or how exalted the situation which he fills. Consequently it is in accordance with principle and certainly in accordance with practice.

The requisition of this section that the government there formed shall be republican in form, simply is in accordance with the principle of the Constitution of the United States which requires that the United States shall guarantee a republican form of government to each State in the Union; and it is well to require that the constitution which the State shall form shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and that it shall be republican in form. That is the guarantee which we make; and when the State constitution comes here we determine whether it is republican in form and then exercise our powers under the Constitution of the United States to require that it shall be made so or the State kept out, provided it is not in such form.

As to the criticism the Senator makes in reference to "Indians not taxed," he will find in that portion of the Constitution of the United States adopted by George Washington and others, after the labors of the months of which he speaks, that language. It is a part of the Constitution which I have no doubt he very fully reveres. In article 1, section 2, of the original Constitution, before any amendments were made thereto, it is provided that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers," &c., "and excluding Indians not taxed." And in another part of the Constitution which I commend to the attention and affectionate regard of my friend from Maryland, in the fourteenth amendment, as "the second sober thought" of the people of the United States, adopted and ratified and now a part of the Constitution of the United States binding upon the Senator and myself and all the people within these broad realms, it is also provided that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed;" so that this exclusion is not strange or unusual.

Now, that the constitution formed by the State should be in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence is certainly right, and in these times most especially should be kept in mind. The principle of the Declaration of Independence was that governments are formed by the consent of the governed, and recognize certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I am not sure that we in all parts of this country keep sufficiently near to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I am not sure that there is not a spirit abroad in the land in opposition to these very principles of the Declaration of Independence. And I am glad for one to have them here repeated, enforced, and enjoined on the people of Colorado, as I trust they will be upon every State which may hereafter be admitted into the Union. But to show my friend that his criticism is novel, at any rate that if it ever was made before Congress has disregarded it; to show that there is nothing in this section which heretofore has not been sanctioned by precedent, I call attention to volume 13 of the Statutes at Large, page 48, section 4, which provides, with reference to a State then to be admitted into the Union—

That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States;—

And certainly each State of the Union should adopt the Constitution of the United States—

whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government: Provided, That the constitution when formed shall be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said constitution shall provide, by an article forever irrevocable, without the consent of the Congress of the United States—

First. That slavery and involuntary servitude shall forever be prohibited in said State—

Now an unnecessary provision, because an amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any State of the Union.

Mr. BOGY. What Territory is that?

Mr. SARGENT. The Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. BOGY. What year?

Mr. SARGEANT. Eighteen hundred and sixty-four. Growing out of the exigencies of the time, growing out of the startling doctrines which were maintained not only in the Halls of Congress and by a certain political party, but upon the battle-field, that the principles of the Declaration of Independence had no existence or that they were mere "glittering generalities" having no force, it was then deemed necessary to enjoin on a State that a government organized in it should be in consonance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence, which declares liberty, as a birth-right inalienable, to every person within its borders. Then it goes on with the other provisions mentioned in this section, every one of them enforced by this precedent; and I say that that is the spirit of the legislation of Congress heretofore, born of a public necessity—a necessity which has certainly not ceased at the present day; and the precedent is well followed in this bill. Now, in order that we may have a record upon this matter, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. One word in reply to the honorable Senator from California. I felt satisfied that outside of the reconstruction measures which were imposed upon the States lately in rebellion the Senator could find no enabling act like this one save that of Nebraska, and I appeal to my honorable friend whether that act for Nebraska is authority for anything?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I had supposed that the Senator from Maryland had some foundation for his amendment; but I discover that the constitution of Maryland in the bill of rights formally adopts the Constitution of the United States. The framers of that instrument evidently rested under the impression that unless they did so it would not be binding. The Senator will see it in the second section of the bill of rights.

The Constitution of the United States and all laws made or which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States are and shall be the supreme law of this State, and the judges of the State and all the people of the State are and shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of this State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The constitutional convention of Maryland——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That was the constitutional convention of 1864.

Mr. MORTON. Eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. They did not adopt the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; formally.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No; they just acknowleded the sentiment that it is the supreme law of the land, which is the fact, and nobody questions that.

But we have been talking about this territorial organization of Nebraska all day, and there has not been a single error in this bill that that enabling act of Nebraska has not been referred to in order to approve it. It was announced by my friend [Mr. SARGENT] on one occasion when it was referred to that it was an exceptional act. This enabling statute for Nebraska was used for illustration, being different from all others, to take money out of the Treasury that had been put there from the sale of public lands; and there were other things connected with it; but whenever an appeal was made on this occasion to precedents, that was the only one that could be appealed to, and yet it was cited as an exceptional act that passed without consideration. That enabling act was passed in 1864. The Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence were in vogue just at that time as being necessary to be impressed on everybody. There were apprehensions then that the people of Nebraska knew nothing about either, and that it was important for Congress to impress upon them the necessity of observing both. So far from being an example by which we should be governed, it should be positively the reverse; we should go back to what is really substantial, rational, reasonable, and just.

But the enabling act of Nebraska, if the honorable Senator from California will observe, does not contain the important words which I will read. Since 1864 there has been additional light thrown upon this body. That enabling act does not contain these important words: "And make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed." That clause is omitted in the Nebraska act, and we are supplying it now. It referred generally to the Constitution of the United States and to the Declaration of Independence to be pressed upon that people; they were to conform to both in the establishment of their organic law; but this was omitted. We are traveling along. While it may not be binding upon future generations, and they may change their constitution ultimately and reject all of it if they choose, yet you provide that the acting governor of this Territory may not proclaim the constitution adopted by its people unless there are incorporated in it the provisions of this bill as that constitution of that State. He has the right to proclaim it or not when the vote of the people shall be taken upon it; and unless it conforms to this bill it may be that he will not declare it the constitution of the State; and because of that very reason it will be incorporated and put upon that people, though it may be against their will, with the same degree of moral or political force that you forced on the people of the Southern States amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

I am opposed to the whole of it. The people upon these great questions ought to be left entirely to themselves. When we possess constitutional power, we should exert it here that it should pervade the whole land and apply to every citizen without regard to State or Territory. To undertake to force upon one Territory or State local legislation that you have not forced upon any other State in the Union is something that I upon this floor will always oppose. If you possess the power to pass a code of laws like this, as you have endeavored to do for the last five or six years, pass it and make it apply to all places, to all States, and to all localities; but let this people come into the Union free and disembarrassed to form their own constitution and be as equal as we all were when we organized this Government.

Mr. MERRIMON. For one I am very thankful to the honorable Senator from Maryland for raising the point which he has raised on this occasion. I do not concur with him, however, in objecting to those terms of the section which embraces the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. They are merely surplusage and they do no harm; but there is a provision which in my judgment is material and is calculated to do a great deal of harm, and in order to obviate that I move this amendment to the amendment: Strike out after the word "and," in the thirteenth line of section 4, to the word "taxed," in line 14; and I ask the Clerk to read that proviso as it would stand if amended by my proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proviso as proposed to be amended by the Senator from North Carolina.

The SECRETARY. The words proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from North Carolina are—

And make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I accept that amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Maryland says that this provision requiring that the new State's constitution shall make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color is now for the first time raised in reference to any new State. That is very true. The fourteenth amendment was finally ratified in 1868, four years after the law passed for the admission of Nebraska. There was no provision in the Constitution of the United States at that time guaranteeing these equal civil and political rights, and consequently Congress had no right to require that a new State coming into the Union should provide against discriminations in this manner. After that act was passed, in 1868 the fourteenth amendment was ratified, and consequently Congress now has a right, and it is its duty, to insist that a constitution shall be thoroughly republican in form; that is to say, it shall see that there are none of these discriminations which shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," or "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

That is the reason why on account of an enlargement of the horizon, because the Constitution is more effective than it was in those days upon these very matters, because Congress and the people and the requisite number of States by their solemn judgment have determined that these discriminations shall not exist, now more than ten years after 1864 and six years after the adoption of this fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it is brought forward.

But the Senator says—I make but a remark upon that—that the case of Nebraska was exceptional. The State of Nevada which was brought in at that time was not exceptional. The act for that State contains the same provision which I have read, requiring them to adopt the Constitution of the United States, and that the constitution formed should be republican and not repugnant to the instrument and be in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I have not looked through or I dare say I might find some precedents in the organic acts antedating the war, but I am not sure of that. I know that public attention, by reason of the war, by reason of the great uprising North and South, has been called to this question and to the necessity for the amendments to the Constitution, and consequently the amendments have been made and the legislation of Congress must follow the amendments; and no matter what temporary successes may be gained by any party in such a struggle, it is as vain to struggle against them as it would be to stem the current of the falling torrent of Niagara. A man would be overwhelmed; and any party that stands up against the spirit of the age must be overwhelmed. Of this I assure my friend. This torrent of events will overwhelm him and all others who insist that discriminations shall be made on account of race or color, or that there shall be a denial of civil or political rights to citizens of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. "Persons."

Mr. SARGENT. "All citizens," says the Constitution. I stand by the Constitution, and I only ask my friend to emulate me in that pious duty which we have both sworn to fulfill, and I dare say the Senator does support it as he understands it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. "And make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed." Does that embrace the Chinese, I ask my friend?

Mr. SARGENT. Chinese are not citizens of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. They are persons.

Mr. SARGENT. They are not within the purview of the Constitution. The Constitution deals with citizens of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Chair to say that the yeas and nays had been called for. Have they been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been ordered. They have been called for, but a Senator rose to address the Chair.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the yeas and nays have been called for, the Chair will state the question. The Senator from Maryland proposes to strike out the proviso from line 12, including the word "provided," down to the word "Independence" in line 16. The Senator from North Carolina moves a modification of the motion made by the Senator from Maryland, which he accepted, so that the proposition of the Senator from Maryland as modified is now to strike out all the words except those excepted by the modification of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. My amendment simply proposes to strike out these words:

> And make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware of that, and the Senator from Maryland accepted that as a modification of his motion striking out all the words; and having accepted the modification to strike out a portion, his motion does not include all now, because he has accepted the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from Maryland cannot accept in behalf of the Senate, but he has so far modified his motion as to allow the words not proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to be stricken out to remain as part of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I had no design to take part in this debate, and only rise now because questions have been mooted and appear to be embraced by the language of this bill which ought not to be passed by without some consideration.

The Constitution of the United States, after providing for the manner of the adhesion of the original States to the Union and for its ratification by nine States in order to become a government for those nine, also gave power in the third section of the fourth article to admit new States, and provided that—

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

There is all that is provided of power and incidental duty in respect of the admission of new States into the Union. It is coupled with the power of control over "the territory or other property belonging to the United States," making a distinction between the powers delegated to Congress over the Territories before they are incorporated as States into the Union and the powers which it has over those Territories when they have been enabled to become States and members of the Union.

Upon the next page we find that which is the full solution and true answer to all the questions touched in this debate, and which are in any way affected by the language of this section of the present bill:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

When, therefore, a State is admitted by the Congress under enabling law, with a due sense of its fitness as to the population within its ascertained and circumscribed boundaries, to become a member of the Union, what is the result? A new government, a new State government, paramount to which is the Constitution of the United States and all laws of the United States made in pursuance of it, and all treaties made, and all laws of the United States which shall thereafter be made in such pursuance, or all treaties which shall be made thereafter, at once and proprio vigore, without "adoption," as this act requires by the people of the Territory, but by their own force, extend instantly, as they did during the territorial condition of its government, over that State, its constitution, its laws, and its people.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that one dangerous feature of to-day—a proposition which is advanced as yet covertly and with hesitation, but which is nevertheless tentatively advanced—is that not simply the constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government to each State shall be executed by Congress, but that there exists the power in Congress in the enabling act of admission to fix immutable conditions in a State constitution which no subsequent experience, no subsequent suffering, no subsequent sense of unfitness shall permit the people of any future generation to amend or ameliorate or abolish.

Why, sir, how absurd and inconsistent is this new-fangled, utterly unauthorized theory of attaching not simply the Federal Constitution and all proceedings under its authority by way of law or treaty as the measure of a State's power and duty under a republican form of government, but to add as an inviolable condition conformity to the principles of a document which every American glorifies, but which he and all men recognize as the great manifesto of revolution—I mean the Declaration of Independence of the American Colonies from the rule of Great Britain. There are many things in the Constitution of the United States which are inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence. If there were time, it would be an easy task to demonstrate this to the satisfaction of every one. The one is a revolutionary manifesto founded upon abstract natural human rights; the other is a government of laws filled with checks and balances established to restrain power within its proper limits. The one was a justification, by natural reason and morals, of the overthrow and destruction of a bad government by its own unhappy citizens; the other was a compilation of rules and principles whereupon to build up a just and permanent government. The first was intended to pull down the wrong; the other to erect and maintain in unassailable stability the right.

The first establishes the right and duty of revolution, and the other seeks to make revolution unnecessary and unjustifiable by providing other and legitimate avenues of relief from evil rulers. Suppose a conflict between some feature of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution and laws of the United States, which of the two instruments are Senators to obey, which are citizens to obey? What is our Government? Is it this Constitution that we have sworn to support, laid down with all its well-defined, carefully-weighed, thoroughly-understood lines of demarkation between rightful power and natural right? Is not that our Government? What was our oath? A plain and simple adjuration to support this written charter of our country's Government in whole and in part, without reservation. What becomes then of this absurd, senseless, utterly inconsistent provision that you now seek to affix upon this inchoate State, when you say that it shall frame a constitution for its government which shall strictly conform to two things inconsistent with each other?

Mr. President, it is perfectly plain to me that we have but two governments within our Union. We have the Government of the United States, paramount in its sphere; we have the State governments, which are the foundation-stones upon which the superstructure of our Federal Government rests. We have no such thing in this Union as a government half State and half Federal. You have no such constitutional abortion, and you cannot create it, as an imperfect State in the Union. The States in the Union are equal members of the Union. You cannot create under your Constitution unequal laws for the different States. They must stand or fall, as to their powers and their rights, by the same law which is prescribed in the Constitution itself. You cannot make a law giving you the authority to invade one member that shall not give you the same authority to invade another. If there be any law delegating a discretionary power of invasion of a State under the pretense of examining for a republican form of government, to overthrow any feature of a State government which is distasteful to the temporary majority of Congress aided by the Executive, that same law must be recognized as well for thirty-seven States as for one; as well for Massachusetts as it is for this new State of Colorado, recognized as fully for New York as it is for the small community which I in part represent upon this floor. There can be no such thing in this Union as an imperfect State. It is unknown to our Federal system. There is not machinery to govern it. It would bring your judicial decisions to mockery and contempt and confusion to attempt to apply principles of constitutional government different in one State from what they are in another. If, however, such claim of power is intended to be made, then let us have the intent marked by open action. If you do intend to have a grade of subject States, if you do intend to have one or more of the States subject to the law of Congress and other States not so subject, let it be known to the country, and if there be popular opinion to sustain you, your form of government will be changed. Your wishes may be carried out but we insist that you ought at least to make your designs known openly upon this subject that we may all appeal frankly to that tribunal of public opinion which, after all, will mold our laws and must mold our destiny as a nation.

What is there in the very loose, vague, useless language of this section—I mean useless for any purpose of securing more effectually to any human being in Colorado every constitutional right that is secured by the Constitution to that same person if living in Massachusetts or New York? The Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land, and although it may be quite superfluous to say so, I have no objection to repeating the truism in every enabling act for the admission of a State and compelling her constitution to contain it; for I scarcely think we can too often hold up the sacredness of law as the only proper government of this country. But when it comes to doing more and picking especial features out of the Constitution, which we all know are there, the authority of which we all recognize, the authority of which no man dreams of disputing, why do you select some and leave out others just as essential and even more so? Why do you select in your enabling act certain provisions of the Constitution and not select others? When you say "the Constitution," do you not mean the entire Constitution? When you say "the Constitution," do you not mean the laws passed in pursuance thereof? You might as well take sections of laws passed at any period of the country's history and say that these States should adopt them as permanent, immutable conditions of their State systems before they can be admitted as States in the Union.

Mr. President, it seems very strange to find that those who prescribe for others so glibly conformity to "the principles of the Declaration of Independence" should show themselves so unmindful of them as to seek to place in the government of any community an immutable provision which should be the law, come what would, let whatever light of experience be thrown upon it. That instrument declares:

> That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

"To them seem;" to the generation to be affected by the form and by the laws. The government being instituted for human happiness, those who live under it were held to be the only judges whether that happiness was attained, and then follows the grand proclamation of revolutionary right against discomfort and oppression:

> Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But, when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security.

Sir, I am glad, in the midst of discussion and events so fresh and painfully present in our minds, to read and recur to these proclamations of our liberty-loving ancestors.

Their revival and application are sorely needed to-day and in this country.

The great principle of the Declaration of Independence is the right to self-relief from suffering when that suffering comes to a people under an unjust, undesired form of government, simply leaving their own judgments, their own sense of the necessity of the occasion, the high "prudence" which is here submitted as the simple test how far endurance shall be wise and how far long suffering shall be borne. Now, sir, what a strange medley it is to find a proposed fundamental law for a State binding a State at one moment to espouse the principles of revolution when it may be demanded for the happiness of its people, and in the next chaining them fast to the dead body of an effete institution or one that may be injurious and which they are never to part from. Why, Mr. President, the people who formed our Constitution did not suppose that all wisdom began or ended with them and their generation. They believed there was a progress and expansion in human knowledge if not in human capacity. They did not believe their Government, as framed by their hands, was perfect. This Constitution, which we have sworn to support, contains abundant provisions for its own well-considered, deliberate amendment. And shall we not leave open to our posterity the right to change when change shall be shown to be expedient and wise and beneficial? And shall we undertake to say that, like the Medes and Persians, the people of this new State shall be forever chained to one immutable charter of government? Why, Mr. President, the principle is utterly false; it is anti-republican; it is against the principles of the Declaration of Independence. It is an abolition of the very theory that lies at the base of our republican system. What is the base of our republican system? What is the theory of the difference between the republic and the monarchy? It is simply that the majority have the power, and the supreme power lies ultimately with them; but for the protection of the minority that power is put in the trammels and harness of the law. Constitutions are framed in times of deliberation, that the safeguards of liberty may not be swept away by unchecked power in times of passion. But those constitutions are made sufficiently elastic that they may be changed when experience shall dictate that change should come. But here we, living under a Constitution that is our supreme law, that is the supreme law of the State or the people that come within our jurisdiction, are undertaking to violate those principles in dealing without authority with a people who will be, as we say of individuals, sui juris, capable of governing themselves under the same limitations that we in the other States govern ourselves.

Mr. President, I do not propose to use any language in a law that I vote for in any but the fullest good faith; and when I ask the people of this Territory (which however I think unnecessary) that they shall "adopt the Constitution of the United States," I simply mean that, and only that. I think the Constitution, of its own force, will instantly and fully exert its authority over every man, official or non-official, who lives within the territory of the United States or of any State in the Union, and no such recital is necessary to aid it. A State cannot be in the Union unless it is under and subject to the Constitution. But I can trace in these selected provisions of the Constitution a desire on the part of Congress to follow the Territory out of its condition of legislative pupilage to the Federal Congress which the Constitution has assigned for it, beyond that condition, and while calling it an independent State to place upon it some congressional collar which shall be worn for all time as its badge of servitude to the majority that placed it there. Sir, to that doctrine I never will assent so long as my views of constitutional duty remain what they now are.

I do not know that any man supposes that he can gain aught by the argument that because we object that certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States shall be selected in preference to any other provisions, as if to make obedience to them more emphatic on the part of the incoming State—to argue there can be any hostility on the part of those who object to such legislation to the Constitution as it is. I prefer that my obedience to the Constitution and the laws be proved much more by what I do than by cheap professions.

If there is power in Congress to impose these conditions and make them permanent upon the State, I would thank some Senator who believes that the necessarily correlative power exists to maintain them in case the State acting as a State should see fit to eliminate them from her constitution, to tell me where his power is found for that; where the Congress of the United States or all the branches of the Government of the United States can find any shadow of power to interfere with the internal government of the State so long as a republican form of government is there maintained and they are not invited there in accordance with constitutional requirements by reason of invasion or domestic violence.

This claim of power has been made, as I said, rather suggestively; it is not made by many; but events transpiring at the present time show that it is made tentatively. The public pulse is being cautiously felt to see how far this claim can be advanced, and how far public acceptance will follow; and I for one would like to make the issue just at the first possible moment. I want to know my fate, and I want to know the issue to be raised; and I shall not hesitate which side to take; nor can I doubt the result when the issue is once fairly comprehended by the people of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, confess this power of Congress to place fetters upon a State so as to prevent any change of her internal institutions and local government in a manner consistent with the conscience, the happiness, the welfare of her people by and through her people alone; admit the power of Congress to do this thing, and what is the use of talking of a federal union of free States? You have a consolidation in its very worst form, because you will have an unlimited power existing in the caprice and will of the accidental majorities in this body and the executive branch of the Government. Admit this doctrine, and that local self-government, which is the school of our people to be republican citizens, is stricken down at once. There is nothing left of this Government worth maintaining if such a doctrine is to be admitted. And yet if the provisions in this section have any effect, they mean that or they mean nothing. I have shown them to be utterly inconsistent with themselves. I have shown that they call upon a people in the same breath to obey a well-defined written charter of limited government, and at the same time to give their unqualified adhesion to a revolutionary manifesto. No, Mr. President, there is no such power. There was no such power given or intended to be given, and none such can be proven, as I say here in the presence of Senators well able to prove it if it exists. They can show and they will show no provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to impress any feature upon the constitution of a State that shall forbid that State to modify or abolish it in accordance with the wish of its people in any subsequent generation. When a State shall have become a member of this Union it stands on an equal footing with every other member.

One cannot be stricken down by any rule or through any claim of power that shall not be equally applicable and fatal to every other State. And if Senators shall not see the danger of the violation of so clear a principle of our Government, then history will have been false and her lessons unreliable if the day shall not come, and come speedily, when their own instructions will return to plague the inventors, and they will drink in bitterness from the very chalice that they have pressed to the lips of others unable now to resist them.

Mr. President, it is never wise to pass laws which are invalid and which must be mere dead letters. A law that is a dead letter, a law that cannot be executed, is a reproach to the legislature that passes it and tends to bring other laws into contempt. If I were asked today what I believed was the chief danger of the people of the United States, I should say the decay of respect for the laws of the land. It is the disregard of law, it is the disrespect for law that is the fruitful source of most of our unhappiness. I could illustrate it in a thousand ways ; did time permit I could turn to almost every Department of the Government, I could go into the highways, into all the avenues of society, and there show you that as a rule a want of respect for the law of the land is an American fault, and a fault that I am afraid is undermining the security of the Government of this country. It matters not whether this disrespect is for the Constitution that is our fundamental law, or for the laws passed in pursuance of it, or whether it be a disrespect for the constitutions of the States and the laws passed in pursuance of those constitutions ; but disrespect for the established rule, disrespect for the spirit of government which is represented by law is in my opinion one of the great dangers of the day, and one that my fellow-countrymen do not seem to me fully to appreciate. The lesson is needed as much by our rulers as by the people; indeed the latter are mere followers of the example. Therefore, sir, I would never willingly assist in placing upon the statute-book any law that could not command their respect and their obedience. If it be an invalid law, it will do neither. It will simply, as I said, draw reproach upon those who legislated for it. It will simply produce contempt for the law itself. No, sir. Let us confine ourselves in our legislation strictly within the limits of those powers granted us, and then insist at all times, in the face of all persuasions of party advantage or the contrary, that those laws here made shall be obeyed and shall be the law for all men, and this whether we are framing laws to admit new States or whether we are framing laws for governing all the States within the limitations of power confided to us.

For this reason I have said as much and as unpremeditatedly as I have in regard to this very important question. I am very clear that the Constitution of the United States of its own force would extend itself over the people of this Territory and of this incoming State without our saying anything about it in the law. But if it be deemed necessary to recite the fact that they are to be governed by the Constitution and laws of the United States—merely repeating a truism —let that be done; to that I have no objection; but do not, I beg of you, couple with that an utterly inconsistent demand upon them that they shall obey the law and a revolutionary manifesto at the same time. It is insensible and unreasonable; it is neither legal nor wise, if there can be any difference between the two.

Therefore I hope this section will be amended. It is not that I refuse in the least to acknowledge the force of every constitutional law and of every amendment to the Constitution. That is not my object at all. I simply object to inconsistently coupling them in this incongruous connection, the Constitution with the Declaration of Independence, and attempting to fasten certain conditions upon the future generations of this incoming State under the implication that the people of that State shall not at their own will and pleasure modify and change their State constitution as their own happiness instructs them. It must be in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or else would be absolutely invalid and of no authority. Nothing of the kind can or should be presumed.

I hold that the people of the new State of Colorado, after they have been admitted to the Union by complying with the conditions of this act, will then be here as an equal member of this Union of States, and that any measure of relief demanded by their people which involves any change in their organic law, can be made just as lawfully and free from interference by the Government of the United States as would the ancient Commonwealth which you, sir, so long represented on this floor. If any claim to the contrary is made, let us know it now, because it will be established at the cost of a revolution in our form of government; and if it is sought to be accomplished, the people ought to know it, and if it be their will, there is nothing else than submission left.

But, sir, I object and protest against such changes being wrought in this indirect and unfair manner, by claiming power wrongfully one day and making that a precedent for some fresh act thereafter.

It is for that reason that I have thought it my duty to say thus much on the subject.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, in my judgment an enabling act like this purports to be ought to be a very brief and a very simple one. It ought simply to provide that the people of the Territory may call a convention and frame a constitution republican in form for the purpose of organizing a State government and making application to Congress to be admitted under that constitution as a member of the Union. All these provisions imposing restrictions on the people of Colorado, other than the single restriction as to a republican form of government, it seems to me are out of place and are not contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

But I do not propose to discuss that feature of the bill now before the Senate. I wish to direct attention to another matter of graver moment than that.

By the Constitution "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" and by the uniform practice of the Government, from the earliest period of its existence until now, every new State, when it is admitted as a member of the Union, comes in upon terms of equal footing with every other State; and Congress, unless it shall violate the spirit of the Constitution, unless it shall repudiate the practice of the American people from the beginning of their Government down to now, cannot do otherwise than admit the State of Colorado upon a like footing with the other States. It is sought, however, by this bill to do otherwise. Under the Constitution of the United States, by its express words and as well by its force and effect, the several States of the Union have power in the exercise of their police powers to make wide and important distinctions in the enjoyment of civil rights to which the people are entitled. For example, in the Southern States we have two races entirely distinct from each other; we have the African race and the white race. These are the prevailing races. Those States have power in the exercise of their police power to provide that the African race shall be educated in one class of schools, while the white race shall be educated in another class of schools. In the exercise of this power they may provide that the white race and the black race shall not intermarry. They have the power to provide that the two races in their attendance upon theaters and other public places shall occupy apartments separate from each other. The State of California, and the State of Oregon, and the State of Nevada, and the States of the far West, may exercise like powers in reference to the Mongolian and other races. They may provide discrimination in the exercise of civil, and, I may add, of political rights, with a view to the proper enjoyment by all the people of sound morals and good and wise government.

I know that it is contended by some persons that under the Constitution the several States cannot exercise such power. Suppose I should admit that for argument's sake, if that is true; then the clause which I propose to strike out is altogether immaterial—nugatory—for the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and no State can pass any law impairing its obligation. If the Constitution of the United States forbids the States to exercise power to make such discriminations, why provide in the constitution of Colorado against the exercise of such power?

If by the Constitution no distinctions can be made in the matter of civil or political rights, why incorporate it in this act, or why incorporate it in the constitution of Colorado which it is proposed to make? If the Constitution has the force and effect contended for by the Senators here, this provision in this act, and when placed in the constitution of Colorado, will be entirely inoperative. It can have no force and effect practically, because the Constitution will operate upon the people of Colorado just as it operates on the people of Maryland or any other State, and no such distinction can be made.

But the truth is the Constitution does not have any such effect upon the rights and powers of the States. It has been so decided by the highest judicial tribunal in this country and by many State courts.

If I am correct in this, if such is the fact, then why undertake to force upon the people of Colorado a provision which is not to operate upon other States of the Union? Why undertake to force the people of Colorado to incorporate into their constitution an organic provison which, if the time shall come when it will be necessary to do so, shall prevent a distinction between the white race and the Mongolian race or any other race different from the white race, not for the purpose of depriving any race or class of people of any rights to which they are entitled, but for the purpose of preserving the morals of the country or promoting the interests of society in other respects? Why undertake to dwarf the proposed State of Colorado?

I say therefore that this distinction ought to be stricken out. If it can have any effect at all, it only will have such effect by incorporating it in the constitution of Colorado to dwarf that State, to deprive it of a power which belongs to every State other than this. My opinion is, as a matter of law, it would be inoperative, but it is manifest it is intended to operate. It would be a reflection upon the decency of the Senate to say that it would incorporate words that can have no operative effect. If these words are to have operative effect, they will dwarf the State of Colorado. They are intended to compel a State to come into the Union as a member of the Union on terms unequal with the other States; and therefore the clause ought to be stricken out. I cannot, will not vote to impose such restrictions. The State, when it comes, must come or ought to come in on an equal footing with any other State. This is the true doctrine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGY. As it is my wish to vote for the admission of this Territory, I am very anxious that anything in the bill which does not meet my approbation should be stricken out. As a matter of information I refer to the act of Congress authorizing the people of Missouri to form a State constitution and to be admitted as one of the States of the Union. In that act of Congress, which was passed in 1820, four conditions were imposed. The conditions were not to be part of the constitution of the new State, but they were to be accepted or rejected by the convention which was to form the constitution of the new State. In the bill before us an effort is made to dictate to the new State certain conditions, certain provisions, which are to form a part of its constitution. If we impose upon a new State applying for admission any conditions, those conditions can never be altered. They must remain as a part of the State constitution forever afterward. We have no right to impose these conditions upon a State. If we have the right, they certainly have not the right to alter those conditions. They must remain a part of the State constitution for all time to come. Such has not been the practice in the admission of new States heretofore, excepting in the cases of Nebraska and Nevada in the year 1864. There is a good reason why conditions at that time were imposed upon those new States. It was during a time of war, when war existed in the country, brought about by a number of States attempting to secede from the Union, and of course disregarding the Constitution of the United States, going beyond the Constitution, going out of the Government. Therefore there was a reason at that time to impose upon those States conditions which would prevent in the future any such effort. However wrong that was at that day, it was the birth of the occasion, brought about by the excitement of that period, fundamentally wrong then as it is now.

I hold that this new State, if it be made a State, can never, after the constitution is formed, change its constitution. If it can change its constitution, we have no right to impose any terms; and, in point of fact, why impose these conditions? The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land over all the States, the new States as well as the old States. The great principles of the Declaration of Independence, which are not to be enforced as practical legislation, will be observed there as great principles affecting the rights of man in opposition to the rights of government. The principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence are of a revolutionary charater. They are not laws; they are great fundamental principles which exist in the breasts of men who love liberty and are willing to sacrifice life and property to maintain that liberty. If we have a right to impose one condition we have a right to impose another, and if that right goes on it will lead to a perfect consolidation of all the States.

Again, the States must all be of equal dignity. This new State of Colorado cannot have less rights than the ancient State of New York, or of Delaware, or of Pennsylvania, or any one of the old thirteen States. She must come in with the same rights, without any limitation, having the same fundamental right to alter and change her constitution whenever a majority of her people may think proper to do so. But a spirit is abroad, a spirit is entertained by a certain party in this country and in this Chamber, that it is not competent for the States to change their constitutions. The Executive in a message sent to us a few days ago intimates very broadly that the reconstructed States, so called, have not the right to change their constitutions; that their constitutions were a part of the contract under which they were readmitted. Can that be true? Can that be correct? Have they lost any of their rights since they have again become members of the Union? Have not the people of Alabama the same right to change and alter their constitution that the people of New York have? Conditions were imposed, and whether right or wrong at the time, it was the exercise of a great power and they had to submit to those conditions; but after the admission of those States they have the same right again to change and alter their constitutions that they had before. Take my own State. Missouri is not exactly a reconstructed State nor was it a State in rebellion, notwithstanding we changed our constitution during the war. The party then in the ascendency changed it entirely and made a constitution which does not meet the approbation of the people now, and a convention in my State will be held in a very few weeks for the purpose of making a new constitution and changing entirely the constitution which was formed in 1863 or 1864. Is it not competent for us to do this? If it be competent for any of the old States to change their constitutions, it will be competent for any of these new States when they come into the Union to change their constitutions.

The views which I am expressing now have been so well and so ably presented by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that it appears to be a waste of time for me to dwell upon the same subject. To my mind he has exhausted it. I repeat that I am anxious to vote for the admission of Colorado and for the admission of New Mexico, yet I do not think I can do so if this provision is retained in the bill, not that I object to any provision declaring that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. It is the supreme law of the land. There is no question about that. I object to nothing the omission of which would have the slightest tendency to weaken this Government, to weaken the ligaments which bind the States to the Federal Government; nor am I disposed to do anything which will destroy the character of the States and make them mere dependents upon the will and caprice of the Federal Government. The original intention I want to carry out, a confederacy of sovereign States, and yet the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof to be the supreme law of the land. Without that qualification I do not wish any State to be admitted. I therefore hope the amendment of the Senator from Maryland may be adopted. Otherwise, I do not see that I can vote for this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Marylahd, [Mr. HAMILTON,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DENNIS. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

Mr. NORWOOD. On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Tipton—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Carpenter, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Harvey, Johnston, Jones, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Thurman, and Wadleigh—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TIPTON. In lines 7, 8, and 9 of section 4 I move to strike out the following words:

And, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States.

I was absent from the Senate unavoidably an hour or more, and am not aware, therefore, whether any motion has been made upon that proposition or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. It has just been voted on.

Mr. LOGAN. We have just voted on it by yeas and nays.

Mr. TIPTON. I understand that vote was on the clause following the word "provided," "and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color," &c. This proposition of mine, then, has not been before the Senate.

Mr. President, this is one of those unheard-of things that occasionally find their way into our legislation. I understand the people of Colorado to be an intelligent people. I understand them to be a patriotic people. I understand them to be a people of ordinary comprehension certainly, and of common sense. They make an application for admission here, and they know that they are doing it under the Constitution of the United States. They know that a constitution which they present here must be in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States. They have never given you any evidence of disloyalty, yet you enact that before you will permit them to form a constitution, which they shall present here for your supervision, you will call upon them to make an expression of their loyalty to the Government of the United States, a Government for which they furnished means and sent forth their soldiers when there was a call made upon the Territories by the Government of the United States. But you do not ask the people of Colorado themselves; they might have the power to address you on this question; but you proceed upon the implication that if the people of Colorado shall elect men to represent them in a constitutional convention, they shall put themselves so far in the power of that delegation that it is competent, that it is constitutional, that it is right, that those representatives by a vote, before ever they can proceed to the work for which they have assembled, must solemnly declare on behalf of the people of the Territory that they do adopt the Constitution of the United States.

If it is necessary for any one to adopt the Constitution of the United States, can he do it by proxy in this manner? If it is necessary that a man shall swear allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, can he endow with the attributes of his sovereignty a neighbor, an agent, an attorney to take that oath for him and in his stead? No man believes that for a moment. Therefore I am utterly at a loss to know why such a proposition should have ever been placed in a bill admitting a Territory to the position of a State under the Constitution of the United States. I have heard no explanation of it, and I apprehend that there is no explanation to be made. Any pledge the delegates may make in regard to the people of Colorado will be absolutely null and void. They have not any power to make it, and you know that they have no power to make it. Every lawyer on the floor of the Senate knows that that legislative assembly can have no binding power whatever in this respect. They will come here to be admitted not on the pledge that their delegates in constitutional convention have made to the Government of the United States, but they will come here with a constitution which is to be measured by the Constitution of the United States. And yet you propose to march them through the magnificent farce of pledging themselves to the Constitution of the United States by men who were elected for the purpose of adopting a State constitution for a Territory.

There is nothing, therefore, in that proposition that ought to remain in the bill. I am in favor of the admission of the people of Colorado; but when I shall come to vote on the bill, whether that proposition is in it or out of it, I wish the people of Colorado to understand that so far as my vote is cast here I do not suppose it is competent to swear them to the Constitution of the United States by a set of del-gates who will be elected clothed with no such power whatever. In regard to all the conditions-precedent that are specified in this same fourth section, no one of them can be binding unless it be incorporated in the constitution, and is constitutional outside of the pledge that these delegates may make in behalf of the people.

I wish to say, therefore, that if this proposition is not stricken out, when I vote for this bill I shall vote with a distinct understanding that that and all pertaining to it in the fourth section is a mere nullity.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am very much astonished at the tenacity with which our democratic friends insist on striking out any compact, any condition, for the admission of States. All the doctors that we have heard talk on this subject so far claim that the moment a State gets into the Union it may rub out and do just what it pleases. If such is the character of the conditions that are annexed to the admission of Territories as States, I do not see why they should be at all particular what the conditions are in the acts for their admission.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply want to say one word. I can see no use whatever in incorporating this provision in the statute. It is true it does no harm, but this is a high legislative body, and I have not heard one single argument or reason why it should be incorporated or what possible good it could effect. And yet the Senate of the United States, perhaps as high a legislative body as there is in the world, actually would be incorporating that which by common consent is useless. Everybody knows that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and will operate as well in Colorado as in any other State of this Union. I ask what is the good sense of the Senate of the United States in the preparation of a statute incorporating in it that which is wholly useless and which adds nothing whatever to the validity of the statute.

My objection to this provision is not simply that it is here, but because it is perfectly useless, accomplishes no good, and, in my judgment, has not that care which ought to be exercised in the preparation of statutes by this high body. I shall vote to strike it out because it is surplusage and certainly of no earthly use by any possibility whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. TIPTON.]

Mr. TIPTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask that the amendment be reported; I have not heard it yet.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, beginning in line 7, it is proposed to strike out the following words?

And, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Tipton—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Washburn, West, and Windom—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Harvey, Johnston, Lewis, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I desire to ask one question of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] who is a member of the Committee on Territories, or the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. HITCHCOCK.] What is the population of that Territory now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have already stated that from the best information obtainable we believe the population to be at least one hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. COOPER. In answer to the question of the Senator from Maryland I will state that the census of 1870 shows a population of thirty-nine thousand eight hundred, according to my recollection. In the committee I opposed the bill on the ground of want of population in the Territory, because we had no evidence, or not sufficient evidence, to show the increased population contended for by the Senator from Nebraska. If there was any such evidence, I am not aware of it.

The yeas and nays were taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COOPER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. DENNIS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY.] If he were here he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. NORWOOD. On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Tipton, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stockton—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Johnston, Lewis, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Schurz, Scott, Thurman, and Wadleigh—19.

So the bill was passed.

AMENDMENTS TO HOUSE BILLS.

Mr. CONOVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4734) to establish certain post-roads; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CEMETERY AT YORK, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to enable the people of New Mexico to form a State government.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, Mr. President, I beg the Senator from Nebraska to allow me five minutes; I will not ask more. For three or four days you have laughed about a little proposition that I brought forward here. Now I want to have it seriously acted on.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Some time ago I stated that I would consent to a motion for an executive session after the bill for the admission of New Mexico should be taken up. Unless that is now insisted upon I should like to make a motion that we take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me we can adopt the same amendments to this bill as to the other; make them identical, and pass this bill if there is a majority in favor of it.

Mr. CAMERON. I had the floor and did not give it up. I ask the Senate to take up the bill to place head-stones over one hundred and sixty buried soldiers in the town of York, Pennsylvania. The people of York during the four or five years of the war nursed and cared for all the sick that came there. One hundred and sixty were buried. They built a monument over their graves; they built an iron and stone fence around the ground; they built a house to accommodate the person who had charge of the cemetery; and they put wooden tablets at the heads of the graves. These tablets are decaying, and they ask the Government to recognize it as a national cemetery and to put proper memorials to mark the remains of these patriotic people. It will cost $1,600. The people of the town have spent more than $20,000. I should like to know if there is a man in the Senate who will deny to these good people this recognition of their great and honorable work? I ask the Senate to take up the bill and pass it without another word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not oppose the bill being taken up, but I shall feel it my duty to oppose it, and I will show to the Senate that the example thus set as a compliment to the Senator from Pennsylvania would not only be a very expensive compliment, but wrong in principle. I will not submit to the passage of a bill of this kind unless the facts be made known to the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I only ask the Senate to take it up, and the Senator from Ohio may take the responsibility of consuming time if he will.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. With the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust not. I have asked for five minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the bill for the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania will not now press the motion after the announcement that his bill will lead to debate. I certainly, if his bill could be passed by unanimous consent, would not object to the New Mexico bill being laid aside informally; but as it is announced that the Senator from Ohio intends to debate and fight the bill, of course it cannot be interposed at the present time.

Mr. CAMERON. Well let him fight it. He will not make a long fight, I think. All I ask is an opportunity to let him do so and let us have a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take up the bill indicated by him for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object for one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Secretary will read the New Mexico bill, which is before the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the motion for an executive session?

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I stated that I would yield for that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. SARGENT. I propose to move seriatim the amendments which were made in the case of Colorado, commencing with the first one and going on all the way through. Perhaps it would be more satisfactory to the Senate to see that each amendment is in instead of moving a substitute embodying them, which has been prepared. On line 23, of section 3, I move to strike out the words "from the passage of this act" and insert "next after the 1st day of September, 1875."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There ought to be an amendment in line 20, of section 3—"be held throughout the Territory at such time in the month of November, 1875, as shall be fixed."

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator can move that. I took the amendments which were carried in the other bill. I got them at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this was put on the other bill; it was moved, at any rate. In line 20 of section 3, after the word "time," I move to insert "in the month of November, 1875."

Mr. MORTON. That was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was agreed to in the other bill.

Mr. SARGENT. The Clerk failed to give it to me then.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Now, in section 5, line 6, after the word "held," I move to insert the words "in the month of July, 1876."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should come in after the word "time;" so as to read:

Shall be held at such time in the month of July, 1876.

Mr. SARGENT. I followed the Clerk; but I accept the modification.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The next amendment which I received from the Clerk is in section 8, line 5, after the word "thereof" to insert—

With the approval of the President.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The next amendment is in section 9, line 2, after the word "located" to insert "and with the approval."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The next amendment is in section 10, line 3, after the word "selected" to insert the words "and approved."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The next amendment is in section 11, line 3, to strike out the word "or" at the beginning of the line and insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In section 12, line 2, after the words "sales of," I move to insert "agricultural."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Now, in lines 2 and 3 I move to strike out the words "have been or," and in line 3 to strike out the words "prior or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. As a proviso to the same section, I move to add—

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any lands disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States, or to any lands now or hereafter reserved for public or other uses.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I move to strike out section 13, as follows:

SEC. 13. That the eighth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved the 4th day of September, 1841, shall be, and is hereby declared to be, applicable to the State of New Mexico, when admitted into the Union as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following additional section to the bill:

That all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation and grants of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. There is one thing that I should like to have a word of explanation about, and that is this clause in section 4, among the conditions to be provided by ordinance of the convention:

Secondly, that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands and to all lands owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States lying within said Territory.

The way it is punctuated it means "the United States lying within said Territory." I am reading from the Colorado bill, and I was told the same words are here. It is on page 4 of the Colorado bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not see any such thing in the Colorado bill, but it may be there.

Mr. THURMAN. It is the second condition in the proviso. The proviso is:

And provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, first, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see in the New Mexico bill anything about Indian lands.

Mr. THURMAN. This is in the Colorado bill. I have been out of the Senate because I have been sick all day. Here it reads:

Secondly, that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands and to all lands owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States lying within said Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in the bill under consideration.

Mr. SARGENT. No; it is not in this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. It is in the Colorado bill. The implication is that when we extinguish the right, they set up title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so; but I did not observe that in the Colorado bill.

Mr. THURMAN. It does not prohibit them from setting up a title. They have no right to that, and their jurisdiction over them we do not intend to take away.

Mr. SARGENT. The language of this bill is:

That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof.

Mr. THURMAN. That is right.

Mr. SARGENT. Cannot we by unanimous consent agree that the provision in the Colorado bill shall be the same as in this bill? I submit that question, whether we cannot by unanimous consent agree that the Colorado bill shall be made to conform with this bill in this provision; so as to read:

Thirdly. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by, the United States.

I offer that as a substitute for the equivalent provision in the Colorado bill. I want to substitute the "thirdly" in this bill for the "secondly" in the Colorado bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The correction may be made in the Colorado bill by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection to that correction being made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think we had better wait to get through with one bill before we take up another.

Mr. STOCKTON. It seems to be taken for granted that there is unanimous consent unless a gentleman rises and makes a noise. I rose three or four times. I certainly never will give my consent to such legislation as that after the passage of a bill a gentleman may rise and suggest that by unanimous consent the bill is to be made different from the bill that passed. I am perfectly willing to have the amendment made, but let the Senator move to reconsider.

Mr. SARGENT. I enter that motion and will call it up by and by.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us finish this bill first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the proposition of the Senator from California.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to strike out from the word "and" in line 12 of section 4 to the word "taxed" in line 14. The clause to be stricken out is:

And make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to understand what is considered to be the effect of that provision in the bill. We know that in some States persons who have resided in the State and are permanently domiciled there are allowed to vote without having even declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. I think many States have gone that far; certainly they have allowed foreigners to vote without even that formality. It is not necessary therefore, in order to be an elector of a State, that one should be a citizen of the United States, that a person should have been naturalized. What would be the effect in case Colorado or New Mexico should not require United States citizenship as a qualification of electors? Would not this provision in the ordinance, if considered binding on the State, compel them to allow all the Chinese to vote? I should like somebody to explain why it would not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CAMERON called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; and they were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. After passing the Colorado bill, and passing it by a large majority, I see no reason why this bill should not pass provided the reasons for passing the Colorado bill were sufficient, as they appear to have been in the minds of the Senate. The vote on the Colorado bill was quite decided; and if the Senate think Colorado is entitled to admission into the Union, the same reasons should induce it to admit New Mexico. The claims of New Mexico indeed are stronger than the claims of Colorado. The claims of New Mexico have the additional sanction of the treaty we made with Mexico by which that Territory was acquired, and also the fact that New Mexico has more population than has Colorado. I shall not therefore, after the Senate has voted to admit Colorado, feel myself under any obligation to oppose the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to ask the Senator who seems to have charge of this bill to state the population of the Territory?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Its population is equal to that of Colorado, and probably greater.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. How many votes did it poll at the last election?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am unable to inform the Senator.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Is there anybody on this floor who is able?

Mr. SARGENT. The census of 1860 showed a population of over ninety-three thousand, and although Arizona and Colorado were cut off afterward, the census of 1870 showed 91,871, and it is very well known that the census is taken very imperfectly indeed in these extensive Territories. It is so even in my State. The State of California unquestionably has a population of seven hundred and fifty thousand souls, but a census taken there to-morrow would not probably show over between five and six hundred thousand. It is impossible to take the census there as you can in the city of Baltimore or the State of Maryland.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. One thing we do know, that there has always been an interest taken in the Delegate elections in that Territory, and I want to know what the vote was at the last Delegate election.

Mr. LOGAN. The vote at the last election, which I am told was not a full vote, was 17,500.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Patterson, Ramsey, Sargent, Spencer, Stewart, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Pease, Pratt, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Stockton—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Washburn—30.

So the bill was passed.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I move that the vote by which the Colorado bill was passed be reconsidered in order that we may correct the text.

The motion was agreed to; and the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the people of the original States, was reconsidered.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I move in section 4 to strike out from line 25 to line 27 these words:

And to all lands owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. DARBY.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire the Senate to give their consent to let me pass a pension bill. It is House bill No. 2765. It will take but a minute. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] the chairman of the committee, recommends it.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2765) granting a pension to John W. Darby was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John W. Darby, late a private in Company M, Thirty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1251) to provide and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, (at six o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, and Washburn—27.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill No. 1251 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senator from Indiana now to give way to me for a few minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I have appealed to the Senator from Indiana, and he has not said whether he would yield to me or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He cannot do it without laying aside the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. CAMERON. Now I move to postpone the bill before the Senate for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. LOGAN. I would not do that.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, I will; and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 10, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cameron, Dennis, Merrimon, Mitchell, Patterson, Ramsey, Spencer, Stevenson, and Thurman—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Boutwell, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Pratt, Sargent, West, Windom, and Wright—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—46.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. THURMAN, (at seven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 4, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Gilbert, Ramsey, and Thurman—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron, Edmunds, Flanagan, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—47.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn; but there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. RAMSEY. Would it be in order to move for an executive session now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. THURMAN. That is a debatable motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not when there is not a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Chair decide that the motion is not debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. THURMAN. I appeal.

Mr. MORTON. I ask unanimous consent to take this vote to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. THURMAN. The motion is to send the Sergeant-at-Arms for absentees. I would like somebody to point out a rule that says it is not debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are only two motions to be put, to adjourn or to send for the absentees. The Chair so rules.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to be referred to the rule which forbids debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us have the rule read. Nothing will be gained——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I object to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to debate. The yeas and nays have been called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what question?

Mr. THURMAN. On the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. THURMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Spencer, Stevenson, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Gilbert, Sargent, and Thurman—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the appeal could be taken at all, it is beaten of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no decision.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to inquire what the motion is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the presence of the absentees; on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I think——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a question of order. Can less than a quorum do any sort of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None except to adjourn or to send for the absentees.

Mr. STEVENSON. Under what rule can they send for absentees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been the uniform practice of the Senate. On this motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Before the vote is taken I ask unanimous consent to make a proposition, and that is that we take the vote on the bill to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. How can you make a bargain when there is not a quorum?

Mr. CAMERON. We can make a bargain for ourselves.

Mr. MORTON. If I can have unanimous consent that we shall take the vote to-morrow at one o'clock, I shall be willing that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. PEASE. I rise to a point of order: that no motion can be entertained, it having been declared that there is no quorum present, except a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the Senate. No motion for unanimous consent can obtain. No motion is in order except to adjourn or to order a call of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest that the Chair count the Senators present and ascertain whether there is not a quorum in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays on this question will reveal the fact whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask—I do not know whether it would be considered a parliamentary question or not—is there no means of ascertaining the presence of a quorum except by the yeas and nays? Is it not a fact patent to everybody that there is a quorum present; and when members sit here and refuse to answer to their names, has not the President of the Senate a right to count the Senate to ascertain if there be not a quorum present?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the call proceed.

Mr. THURMAN. The rule ought not to be enforced on one side and not on the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed on the motion to send for absentees.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OGLESBY, (when his name was called.) The roll is being called now, as I understand, on a motion for the President to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to go for absentees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To request their attendance.

Mr. OGLESBY. And if that fails for the want of a majority, there being no quorum present, I suppose they will not be sent for. If the motion prevails will they be sent for?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. And shall we have to remain here till they come?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. [Laughter.]

Mr. OGLESBY. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Dennis, Gilbert, McCreery, Merrimon, Ramsey, and Stevenson—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—37.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not make any difference. The order is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request the presence of absentees.

Mr. PRATT. I move to postpone the pending order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No business can be transacted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are executing an order of the Senate now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Can it not——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No business can be transacted except a motion to adjourn. A call of the Senate is being executed.

Mr. PRATT. Cannot my motion be heard?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It cannot. It is out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. Cannot the Senator from Indiana, by unanimous consent, be allowed to present his bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no quorum. There cannot be unanimous consent.

Mr. PRATT. I think this motion of mine would produce a quorum in very short order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. LEWIS, (at seven o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

A division was called for.

Mr. LEWIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I am informed that it was understood by our friends on the other side of the Chamber that if this vote should be taken on the two bills which have been passed without any unnecessary delay, after that we should adjourn. I did not know it, and I was not a party to it, but if that was the understanding and if in consideration of that Senators have withheld speeches which they had intended to make, I think not only good faith, but a regard for our own comfort and convenience, require that we should carry out the understanding whatever it was, and I for one will do it although I did not know of it. But certainly if the speeches which we might naturally have expected upon two bills of such importance have been withheld on the other side upon that understanding, I think we should abide by it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I moved that the Senate adjourn, and it is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposed no objection was raised to the statement by the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Vermont desires to make a statement.

Mr. LEWIS. I waive the motion for the moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So far as I know I have never violated an engagement of honor on this floor. I never heard until this minute that there was such an understanding on the part of anybody. When we have understandings in the Senate that are expected to bind gentlemen, it is usually supposed that they will be made known to them or publicly stated, so that they might have known of them if they had been present. If any gentleman will say that any public statement of that character was made, whether I was here to hear it or not, I shall most cheerfully acquiesce, because I feel myself bound. If none was made, if gentlemen have made private engagements, of course they must be responsible and nobody else.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks to make a statement. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PEASE. It occurs to me that if any such arrangement was made by our friends on the other side of the Chamber they certainly violated that pledge in moving to adjourn after we had passed upon the Colorado question and we had to rally our forces in order to pass the New Mexico bill. So it seems to me they are debarred from entering any complaint now, for if any arrangement was made I say they were to remain until we passed those two bills, and they certainly did move to adjourn before.

Mr. SCOTT. May I be permitted to recall what occurred, from which I think, if it was not expressly stated certainly, it was inferred, that an adjournment should take place?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Early in the afternoon the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] made a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. When he made that motion the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] who had charge of the Colorado bill rose and stated that he did not wish that motion made at that time, but that if the Senate would proceed with the Colorado bill and then permit him to take up the bill for the admission of New Mexico, he would not then object to the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, although it was not stated that proceeding to the consideration of executive business would be followed by adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated exactly the reverse.

Mr. SCOTT. I know, upon the question of going in at that time; but although it was not stated, still it did create the impression I think on the mind of nearly everybody that all that was expected by the Senator from Nebraska was to get up the bill for the admission of New Mexico and then an executive session would follow and an adjournment take place. Instead of that the New Mexico bill was taken up and passed, and my own impression was that there would be an adjournment in pursuance of what was stated.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. And the Senator from Indiana, when his bill was taken up, took his coat and hat. That was the idea, and we certainly so understood. I appeal to the Senator from California if it was not so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed if there be no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, Mr. President, I have no authority to speak for the majority of the Senate, nor for any gentleman who has charge of the business now before the Senate. I stated what I said in regard to the executive session publicly, and the Senate understood all that that implied. They had a right to their own conclusions from that implication. But I had no right to make, and of course I did make no arrangement that binds anybody. I stated, however, what I expected in private conversation with Senators sitting near me. I gave them my personal opinion, and to that extent only am I responsible. It was of course my personal expectation that no further business would be transacted. I hardly hoped even to be fortunate enough to pass the New Mexico bill to-night, and with that passage I was agreeably disappointed. Beyond that of course I am not responsible and cannot be held responsible, except that personally I should have been very glad, with other Senators, to adjourn at that time had I been able to induce the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. ALCORN. I know nothing as to an arrangement or as to the form in which the proposition came if it came at all, or how it was accepted; but I do know that the general understanding around me in this circle was that as soon as the two bills which have been referred to should be passed, the Senate would adjourn. I heard it said in my hearing on my right and on my left, and I supposed in truth that there was a general understanding to that effect. Hence it was that I voted for an adjournment to carry out what I understood to be the consent of all parties.

Mr. BOREMAN. I simply wish to corroborate what has been said by the Senator from Mississippi. It was understood in this portion of the Chamber that when we got through with the two new State bills there would be an adjournment. I know that was the impression here, and some of the opponents of the bills abated their opposition to some extent on that ground. I am satisfied of that, and I think in good faith we ought to adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. Before a vote is taken on the adjournment, I ask unanimous consent to an agreement to take the vote on this bill to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We cannot agree to that.

Mr. MORTON. Say two o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. Say four o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is proceeding by common consent.

Mr. LOGAN. It is perfectly evident that we have a quorum; it has been perfectly evident all the evening that we had a quorum. I do not desire to break any agreement, but I do say that if the Senate can be held to an agreement that may be made by any one member, not published to the Senate, and Senators may then be called upon to carry out such agreements, legislation might be thwarted from now to the end of the session. I have always understood that when agreements were made between the different sides of the Chamber they were made publicly. I heard nothing of this agreement; I knew nothing about it. It would have been much better, if such an agreement is to be carried out, that Senators should have stated it some time ago. That would have saved a good deal of trouble, and we might have been home by this time. I suppose the idea now is that we are to adjourn and give up after having ordered a call of the Senate and sent the Sergeant-at-Arms for the purpose of requesting Senators to come here for the reason and only reason that Senators sat in their seats and refused to answer to their names when a quorum was certainly present. If that is the way to carry out agreements, I do not understand this thing of agreements. I have learned something by this performance. If we are ever in the minority here, the best way for us to stop legislation is just to sit still and not vote. There is no rule that requires a man to vote.

Several SENATORS. Legislation has not been stopped.

Mr. LOGAN. It has stopped legislation. I do not say there was any intention of that kind; but I say it would have been better for Senators to have made this statement about an agreement before this thing occurred, and saved us the trouble of witnessing men sitting here in silence and refusing to answer to their names. If it is thought we ought to carry out an agreement of this kind, I will consent, and would have done so along ago. Here we have been held for an hour in this way without any one stating that there was any such agreement. Now at this late hour it is said an agreement was made. If the rest of the Senate consent, I have no objection; but for myself I do not understand it; for my part I do not consider myself bound by it; and I do not propose to carry it out unless the majority of the Senate is in favor of doing so.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to make a short explanation—only a word or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. We had no formal understanding on this subject, but I understood that after we should have gotton through with the bills admitting the two Territories we should adjourn. I think that was the general impression all arounnd the Senate Chamber; and as evidence of it the Senator who had charge of the bill now brought up left his place, left the Senate Chamber for the purpose of going home when it was taken up. I certainly should not have persisted so much in bringing up my poor little bill if I had not been under the impression that when night came we should adjourn in a few minutes. I considered the business of the Senate as done for to-day, and therefore I thought that little bill might be acted on, and for that reason I persisted as much as I did.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate adjourn. The Senator from Pennsylvania is speaking by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMERON. I only intended to say further that I shall certainly vote for the adjournment now. I think that is due to our own sense of justice to many gentlemen here. As further evidence that it was believed so, a great many of our own friends who are anxious to vote on this particular bill have left. There are empty seats here which would have been occupied if those gentlemen had believed this bill was to be pressed now.

Mr. LEWIS. It is very evident that in the present temper of the Senate no business can be transacted. I insist now on the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about putting the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MORTON. Before the motion is put I again ask if we cannot get an agreement to vote on this bill to-morrow at four o'clock.

Mr. BAYARD. There has been no suggestion of a disposition at any time to make any undue delay in debate, and it is impossible to say how long this question may be discussed. I trust it will be discussed with a due sense of each man's responsibility to the country and to himself. There has been to-day an understanding in regard to some absence of debate on a measure, which does not seem to have been regarded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was not a public understanding.

Mr. BAYARD. Therefore the expectation of those who were to be affected by it has been disappointed.

Mr. MORTON. In view of what has taken place, I am satisfied no business can be transacted to-night, and I consent to an adjournment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator from Delaware is not quite fair in saying that an understanding had been entered into and that the Senator is not disposed to regard it.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say an understanding was entered into. I said that it was perfectly well understood that the Senator who had the two territorial bills in charge would himself move an adjournment. When a member of this body is placed in charge of a measure by the voice of the majority of the Senate, we suppose that he has some control over the conduct of the business of the Senate; and when he says to us "when these two bills have passed I shall move to adjourn," we suppose that he speaks with some authority, because we can then see what the termination of the business is. I do not mean to say that that business ought to have been prolonged or would have been prolonged. I do not mean to say that there was an abstinence from debate, because I have no right to say that. I only say that when the proposition was made that there should be an adjournment by the person in charge of the business of the evening, we were surprised that it was not agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. When, Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I insist on the vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think after the Senator from Delaware's remarks, I ought to be allowed to reply; but if the Senator from Ohio does not think so, I will yield.

Mr. BAYARD. I beg that the Senator may be heard.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Delaware replied to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. He did not reply to me, but interrupted me.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Delaware says there was no understanding entered into, but the thing was perfectly understood. I do not understand myself the difference between those terms; but it seems to me now, from what has been said on both sides of the Chamber, that the Senator who is in charge of the bill, who Senators on the other side had the right to suppose had our confidence, as he certainly has, gave them to understand that at the close of the two bills we should adjourn. Therefore, out of respect to him, and out of regard for the understanding which was had on the other side, I shall vote to adjourn; but I never heard of the understanding until I heard the complaint on the other side.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. I desire to say that I never did, either publicly or privately, then or at any other time, say I would move to adjourn, and I presume no Senator on this floor will say that I so stated.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It was to go into executive session.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the Senator must have been gravely misunderstood, for his statement was heard by more than one Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They must have misunderstood me. I said publicly that I would not oppose going into executive session.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That was it.

Mr. LOGAN. That was no agreement to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEWIS] has moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from Indiana who has charge of the bill desires an adjournment. If so, I vote yea.

Mr. MORTON. I said I would not oppose an adjournment, because I am satisfied nothing will be done to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the motion to adjourn, and declared that it appeared to be agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth of the Senators not seconding the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at seven o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) The ayes have it. The Senate stands adjourned till to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1875.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHARLES A. LUKE.

Mr. McCORMICK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4837) for the relief of Charles A. Luke; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It appropriates, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,200, to be paid by the Secretary of War to Charles A. Luke, now of Prescott, Territory of Arizona, in full compensation for property taken from him for the use of the Government in the extension of the military reservation at Camp Mohave, in said Territory, under General Orders No. 62, dated at headquarters of the Army, August 16, 1869.

Mr. McCORMICK. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCORMICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVEYANCE OF HOMESTEADS IN DAKOTA.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyances of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance;" which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It provides that the twentieth section of the act named in the title shall not be construed as an absolute repeal of chapter 37 of the laws of Dakota, approved May 12, 1862, but only as repealing so much of said chapter 37 as is inconsistent with the first-named act, and no other effect shall be given to said twentieth section.

Mr. POLAND. I will state in a moment the object of this bill. By some mischance or other, when the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota at their late session passed an act relating to homesteads, by its twentieth section they repealed a former chapter which provided for homesteads. But that chapter also provided for the exemption of personal property, so that all exemptions of personal property are repealed. There is in consequence a great state of alarm in that Territory; public meetings are being held; and it this is to correct that mistake.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SITE FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT JERSEY CITY.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, and that it be now passed. It is simply a bill to authorize the condemnation of land.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. The bill makes no appropriation whatever.

Mr. GARFIELD. It enlarges the limit, does it not?

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen who desire to ask unanimous consent. If members will simply be quiet and listen they have the entire control, for a single objection will stop any such measure. Gentlemen merely ask the privilege of presenting these things. It will ease the business of the House very greatly to devote a little time to that kind of business. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the passage of the bill which will now be read by the Clerk.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at private sale, or by condemnation if necessary, a suitable site for the public building to be erected in Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, provided for by act of Congress approved March 3, 1873; the proceedings to condemn to be instituted in the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, and conducted under the direction of the said court, so far as practicable, in the manner prescribed by the act of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey entitled "An act to authorize the formation of railroad corporations, and regulate the same," approved April 2, 1873, or such other mode of condemnation as shall be in pursuance of the laws of said State, and as the said court may determine upon; provided that the cost of said site shall not exceed the amount appropriated by the said act of March 3, 1873.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LYDIA CRUGER.

Mr. BURROWS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4839) for the relief of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Shepherd, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $18,124.34 for the payment of the judgment rendered in favor of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Shepherd, by the Court of Claims of the United States on the 19th day of November, A. D. 1860, to be paid to the said Lydia Cruger or her legal representatives.

Mr. BURROWS. This is a judgment of the Court of Claims that never has been paid. The bill is the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURROWS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMER ALABAMA.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration and adoption at this time:

Resolved, That it shall be in order to consider an amendment in Committee of the Whole to the miscellaneous appropriation bill to allow the sum of $3,000 to pay a bill of general average on account of the steamer Alabama.

I will say that this matter has been investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary, and is reported by them unanimously.

Mr. ATKINS. Does it come from any committee?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, and is unanimously reported by them.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back with some slight amendments the bill (H. R. No. 4573) to aid the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The first section of the bill provides that whenever, in the prosecution and maintenance of the improvement of the Wisconsin and Fox

Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, it becomes necessary or proper to take possession of any lands, or the right of way over any lands, for canals and cut-offs, or to use any earth-quarries or other material lying adjacent or near to the line of said improvement and needful for its prosecution or maintenance, the officers in charge of said works may, in the name of the United States, take possession of and use the same, after having first paid or secured to be paid the value thereof, which may have been ascertained in the mode provided by the laws of the State wherein such property lies, or by commissioners appointed and directed by the Secretary of War; provided, however, that when the owner of such property shall fix a price for the same which, in the opinion of the said officer in charge, shall be reasonable, he may take the same at such price without further delay, and in case of real or mixed property may receive a conveyance thereof in fee to the United States; that in case any lands or other property is now or shall be flowed or injured by means of any part of the works of said improvement heretofore or hereafter constructed, for which compensation is now or shall become legally owing, and in the opinion of the officer in charge it is not prudent that the dam or dams be lowered, the amount of such compensation may be ascertained in like manner, and upon like conveyance payment may be made; and that the Secretary of War may employ a competent attorney to represent the interests of the United States in legal proceedings under this act, and for flowage damages hereinbefore occasioned.

The second section provides that a portion of the appropriation to be made for the further prosecution of the improvement aforesaid, not exceeding in amount $25,000, may be applied in payment for the property and rights taken and used as aforesaid.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some little explanation of this bill.

Mr. SAWYER. There is now no law under which the Government, in the prosecution of any public work of this kind, can own the fee of real estate. In this case they want to set the dams and control them, and this is what the Department asks.

Mr. BLAND. I object.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BLAND said: I withdraw my objection to the bill in relation to the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, as I understand an amendment has been proposed to it.

Mr. SAWYER. The amendment proposed is to strike out the words "to be" in section 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "now," so that it will read "that portion of the appropriation now made for the further improvement," &c.

There being no further objection, the amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSION OF SAINT JAMES, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. PRATT. I ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1450, for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, and that it be considered at this time.

Mr. HUNTON. At the instance of the Delegate from Washington Territory, [Mr. MCFADDEN,] I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. On the 8th of December last a bill was recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency with the privilege to report it back at any time. I have been instructed by that committee to report that bill back now with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. If it be a question that will raise discussion the Chair will be compelled to recognize either the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who has been upon the floor for some time with a privileged report, or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] with another privileged motion or report. The Chair has been entertaining propositions for unanimous consent. But if business is to be carried on in the regular order, then it must be done intelligibly and according to precedence.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us come to the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to have a bill passed to compensate a man who has paid money into the Treasury which was not due from him. The bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us take the regular order of business first.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This bill has passed the House once, and has been reported twice from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has just the same right as other members to make privileged reports. But there are several gentlemen who stand here upon a precise equality as to the right to report at any time. As to the precedence of those rights, that is a question for the House and not for the Chair to decide.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

ELECTION CONTEST—PINCHBACK vs. SHERIDAN.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the case of Pinchback vs. Sheridan, concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected a member of Congress from the State of Louisiana for the State at large in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That George A. Sheridan was duly elected a member of Congress for the State at large from the State of Louisiana in the Forty-third Congress, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. On behalf of the minority of the committee I submit their views, accompanied by the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George A. Sheridan is not shown to be entitled to a seat in this House as Representative at large from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] that he should amend his resolutions by substituting for the words "member of Congress" the words "Representative in Congress." There is no such office as "member of Congress."

The reports were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID R. DILLON.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the House shall pass the bill (H. R. No. 4472) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to defend certain suits against David R. Dillon.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf of the United States, to defend the suit or suits brought in the State court of Georgia against David R. Dillon for cotton delivered by said Dillon to the Treasury agents of the United States and the proceeds thereof by them turned into the Treasury of the United States, if, upon inquiry, he shall find the facts so to be; and the said suits shall be removed to the circuit court for the district in which said suits may be pending, with like effect, and the same proceedings shall be had thereon as are now provided by law in case of suits against an officer appointed or acting by or under any revenue law of the United States.

Mr. COOK. I object.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. COOK said: I withdraw my objection.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4840) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that it shall be lawful for any citizen of the United States, or any person of requisite age who may be entitled to become a citizen and who has filed his declaration of intention to become such, to file a declaration with the register and the receiver of the proper land district for the county of Lassen, California, in which any desert land is situated, that he intends to reclaim a tract of desert land situated in said county not exceeding one section, by conducting water upon the same, so as to reclaim all of said land within the period of two years thereafter; and said declaration shall be under oath, and shall describe particularly said section of land if surveyed, and if unsurveyed shall describe the same as nearly as possible without a survey; which said declaration shall be supported by the affidavit of at least two credible witnesses, establishing to the satisfaction of the register or receiver the fact that said lands are of a character described in the act. And at any time within the period of two years after filing said declaration, and upon making satisfactory proof of the reclamation of said tract of land in the manner aforesaid before the register and the receiver of said land office, such person shall be entitled to enter or locate the reclaimed section, or any part thereof, in the same manner as in cases where public lands of the United States are subject to entry, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, and shall receive a patent therefor.

The second section provides that all lands within said county of Lassen, exclusive of timber lands and of mineral lands, which do not produce grass or which will not without such reclamation produce some agricultural crop, shall be deemed desert lands within the meaning of the act.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope some explanation will be given of this bill; is it a report from a committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask one question. It is whether any of these lands are within the limits of a railroad grant?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, sir; none of them.

Mr. LUTTRELL. None of them; and there can be no possible objection to this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAVID L. STANTON.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Ways and Means the bill (H. R. No. 1974) for the relief of the sureties of David L. Stanton.

The bill was read. It provides that John T. Ensor, Zephaniah Poteet, and the other sureties of David L. Stanton, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, by bond to the United States dated April 24, A. D. 1869, be, and they are thereby, released from their said liability arising from any defalcation of the said David L. Stanton as such collector; and the proper officer of the Treasury Department be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to dismiss any and all suits that may have been instituted and are now pending in favor——

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. RANDALL. I will withdraw my objection to the bill which has just been read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I renew the objection, and call for the regular order of business.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Elections, presented a report on the contested-election case of Gause vs. Hodges from the first district of the State of Arkansas, accompanied with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Lucien C. Gause is not entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That Asa Hodges is entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I give notice that the minority of the committee proposes to submit a report in this case.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that the minority of the committee have leave to submit their views.

The report was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.]

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to present some privileged reports from the Committee on Printing. In the first place I report the following resolution for the printing of the usual number of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there shall be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874; five thousand for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was adopted.

SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed four thousand copies of the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1874; one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, two thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and one thousand copies for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report. The question is on agreeing to it.

The resolution was adopted.

FIRST AND NINTH CENSUSES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses. It directs the Congressional Printer to bind in suitable form for ready reference and preservation the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses of the United States.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT FOR 1874.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That ten thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1874 be printed; two thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and seventy-five hundred for the use of the institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound in quarto form one thousand copies of each of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the final reports of the geological survey of the Territories, for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

INDEX OF FINANCIAL BILLS.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a letter of the Clerk of the House relative to the index of several legislative matters, have directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the index of bills introduced into the House from the First to the Forty-second Congress, inclusive, relative to banks, currency, public debt, tariff, and direct taxes, prepared by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, be printed and stereotyped.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask that the letter of the Clerk on this subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1875.

SIR: I have caused to be prepared an index to the various bills presented in or acted upon by the House of Representatives from the First Congress to the Forty-second Congress, inclusive, relating to banks, currency, public debt, tariff, and direct taxes.

The indexes give the title of each bill, the number of the Congress and the session, the name of the person introducing it, the page of the Journal having references to it, the committee to whom referred, the number of the report, the nature of the report, the action of the House of Representatives, if any, the action of the Senate, if any, and the date of approval, if approved.

In the belief that the printing of this index will be of great service in the investigation of this class of subjects, I respectfully submit the manuscript, with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee for their judgment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. McPHERSON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives United States.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] rises to a point of order.

Mr. COBURN. Before the House proceeds to the consideration of that report I desire to raise the question whether that shall be considered first or whether the bill reported from the special committee in relation to political affairs in Alabama shall have preference.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the regular order.

Mr. COBURN. The bill reported from our committee provides for general elections, and I ask that it be considered in preference to the other.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. In connection with this matter I desire to ask this question: If this bill relating to the South is not considered to-day, or if a day be not now fixed for its consideration, will it not require a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote to reach it hereafter?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. COBURN. I will ask further whether it is not liable to be interrupted constantly by motions to suspend the rules?

Mr. RANDALL. These are not parliamentary inquiries; they are in the nature of debate or argument.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say a word in relation to the order of business. Some time ago I submitted a report in reference to matters in Arkansas, which has priority in point of time of this matter in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] and also the matter in charge of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] I failed to call it up from the urgency of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriation in relation to the public business. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations said it was absolutely important for the proper preservation of the appropriation bills, and to get them along I should stand out of his way and let him report one more appropriation bill. And for that purpose I do not intend to bring up this matter of Arkansas to be in his way; but as against either of these other measures I shall claim of the House that I am entitled to priority in point of time and to have the first consideration of the matter in relation to Arkansas before either of these other measures is considered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to call the attention of the House to a fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear a parliamentary inquiry. No gentleman loses his right by this discussion in regard to the order of business.

Mr. MAYNARD. A few minutes since I was recognized by the Chair, and, acting under the authority which the committee I belong to has, reported from that committee a bill which I want to put on its passage. At the instance of the Chair action was withheld for gentlemen to present matters by unanimous consent. I wish to inquire of the Chair the attitude of that bill, because I do not wish to lose the privilege which the committee deem valuable.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If these bills now struggling for the floor are not taken up to-day, will not a motion to suspend the rules take the reporters off their feet at any hour after to-day?

The SPEAKER. It is important the House should act understandingly on this point of business, and gentlemen will take their seats and preserve order. The Chair will now hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who wishes to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to say these resolutions contain an important recommendation; one of which is concurred in by all the members of the committee, of all political parties, addressed to the Louisiana house of representatives, to remedy what they deem an injustice, and that house of representatives will adjourn in a very short time, and it is important the opinion of this House should be expressed. The other resolution contains an important declaration to this House as to who shall be considered the lawful governor of that State, which question is now in abeyance. It seems to me as a matter of importance it has priority over the general legislation proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] and also over the recommendation made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] in regard to Arkansas, which is that a certain existing state of things there shall not be disturbed by anybody. Our report asks the House to do something toward giving peace and quiet to a great State and curing an existing evil of the most enormous and serious magnitude, affecting the politics, commerce, and peace of that State. The proposition of the gentleman from Vermont relates simply to an intention not to disturb an existing condition of things in another State. I do not mean to ask the House to take any considerable time. I will call the previous question, if the House consents, at the end of an hour, and let all the general debate on this general case come up under other bills. I hope, and I desire to say I believe sincerely, that it would be the desire of both parties in the State of Louisiana, for the sake of their peace, for the safety of their lives, for the sake of their commerce and business, this House should express at once its judgment in regard to the matters involved in these resolutions. It does not require any determinations of the complicated facts at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois desires to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the further time of the House will not be consumed in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. What I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, is in the same line substantially of the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] except that mine will relate to Arkansas. As has been said by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] the case of Arkansas presents the most urgent demand, it seems to me, for the consideration of this House; certainly as strong a case as the one to which reference has just been made. It is prior in point of time, and I desire very much to see it at once considered. It has been postponed from time to time. The condition of that State and the questions connected with this matter are quite as important—I will not say more important—but at least quite as important as the case of Louisiana. The people are in as great a state of uncertainty, as great a state of dread—perhaps in every condition, in everything equally demanding the attention of Congress in some shape at once. Of course it is a matter for the House to determine; and I do not want to antagonize gentlemen who have other reports in charge.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask my colleague to yield to me for one moment for a suggestion. Is not this the way to get the House out of the trouble? To assign an evening when this matter may be considered. Everybody is interested enough in it to come here. And then let the appropriation bills go on, for you cannot get a quorum at an evening session on appropriation bills.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My parliamentary inquiry is this: whether, if these resolutions were postponed by a vote of the majority until to-morrow morning, they would then after the reading of the Journal stand with the same rights as they have now? If that is so, I am ready to accede to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. They will have the same rights. The Chair, however, will ask the gentleman to state his inquiry again.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to know whether the House may not by a majority vote postpone these resolutions until to-morrow morning after the morning hour, and whether they will not then come up in the same position.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman had better hold them in his own possession, because if he calls them up now and they are postponed, they must take their chance the same as other postponed matter. The Chair did not understand the gentleman's question exactly as he first put it. Postponement would subordinate the privilege which now exists in them. They are safer in the gentleman's hands.

Mr. POLAND. I would like to make a further suggestion about this matter: that these various measures in relation to the Southern States all stand aside, and let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] get through his first appropriation bill, and then that these various reports be taken up in the order in which they have been presented to the House.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is listening to gentlemen now because for the future he will not allow time to be consumed in settling the order of business. He desires that this shall be settled now, that members may fully apprehend the situation.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I apprehend the regular order is the report of the Committee on Elections with respect to the election of President and Vice-President. I offer to the House, if that matter is taken up, that the previous question shall be called at the end of one hour. And I desire to say that it ought to be considered before the appropriation bills, because all parties take an interest in expediting the appropriation bills; and there is no necessity in that case, as in this, of immediate consideration. And I certainly cannot yield the floor, being entitled to it in the regular order of business, unless we are voted down in the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen will now resume their seats, the Chair will explain the situation.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow me a moment on the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say one word in regard to the order of business. Among the different propositions which are the result of the action of the investigating committees appointed by this House to visit the Southern States, and which has occupied a large portion of the time of several members of the House, there are some measures proposed which have the common concurrence of all the committees or the majorities of all the committees. Among them is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] I for one, representing the Vicksburgh committee, desire that those measures shall have preference and prominence before the special report of that committee; and I think the House should take up and act upon those measures at the earliest possible moment. If I understand aright, although these committees are privileged to report, yet after to-morrow they must yield at any time for a motion to suspend the rules; and therefore these committees, privileged to report at any time and ordered by the House to make these investigations, may be deprived of the opportunity to report at all.

And I wish to say this in addition to my venerable friend from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] That gentleman claims a priority of right to report to this House. Now, the gentleman is the representative of the masterly inactivity of the committee and the House, and has pursued the policy of not reporting——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that does not relate to the order of business.

Mr. POLAND. I think the gentleman from Michigan should not so misrepresent me. The report of this committee was prepared immediately after the recess, and there was a considerable delay in presenting it in order to accommodate one member of the committee who desired to present a different line of views. Our report has been made to the House three weeks ago.

Mr. CONGER. I have never heard the gentleman offer to call the attention of the House to it; and he reports in favor of no action, which is certainly masterly inactivity.

Mr. POLAND. I have already stated to the House that I had delayed calling up the report at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that they might have time to carry forward the measures necessary for the maintenance and support of the Government.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would ask the gentleman from Vermont if this bill is not necessary for the support and maintenance of the Government quite as much as the appropriation bills?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly, certainly; and I propose as soon as the next appropriation bill is out of the way to proceed with it with all possible speed and dispatch.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have no reflection to cast on the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. I do not think anybody has.

Mr. NEGLEY. But I think it time that these questions were considered by the House.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Inasmuch as this matter has been debated I desire to say a word, and as the gentleman from Michigan has drawn his rapier and has aimed at some members of the Arkansas Committee, I desire to say something on the subject. I have worked early and late on the Arkansas case ever since I was appointed a member of the committee to inquire into the affairs in that State, and the delay in action on the part of the committee ought not to prejudice the case. It is true, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee, that after the recess the report of the majority was drawn and there was delay in making the report because there was not union in the committee. But the report was made two or three weeks ago and there has not been an opportunity since that I could see when I felt that I could antagonize the regular legislation of the House by pressing this matter, or when I could urge my friends to take it up, although we have never been unwilling to take it up.

Now, sir, I disagree, and disagree sharply, with the chairman of the committee in the results arrived at from this investigation; but I do not think that there has been any improper delay in making it up. I do not believe that he has unnecessarily postponed the matter; and now, with reference to the residue of these propositions relating to the Southern States, I have only to say that this has precedence and is as important as any, and ought to take the lead in this line of discussion.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say one word. I am fully satisfied that the debate upon the bill which is submitted by the committee in relation to the state of political affairs in Alabama will cover almost every question applicable to Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, or any other part of the South. Any question relating to those States can be debated on this bill, and hence I propose to have general debate on the whole question and act on the matter, and to have legislation that will amount to something. What we propose must pass the Senate; mere resolutions need not. Resolutions amount to nothing comparatively. There is something here which is proposed to be put in the shape of law, and it seems to me that the whole matter can be settled more reasonably after general debate on this bill than after special debate upon special resolutions. We must come to legislation in the end, and in the limited time it ought to be first taken up.

Mr. SPEER. If this discussion is to embrace the discussion of the whole condition of the Southern States, it is nothing more than courteous that the report of the committee appointed to investigate the affairs at Vicksburgh should first be in. It has not yet been made and is not printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that every gentleman in the House may apprehend the precise condition of its business.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suppose I have not yielded any right I have to the floor?

The SPEAKER. None. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] has a bill pending or joint resolution from the Committee on Elections in relation to counting the votes in the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, which was made under a resolution giving that committee the right to report at any time. They reported some days since, but before the report was considered the House passed to other business. It is now pending as reported. On it the House can raise the question of consideration as it can do upon any of these various reports which are authorized to be made at any time. These reports stand in that respect precisely on the same privilege. It is not possible for the Chair under the rules or in equity to give precedence to one over the other. As to precedence between the reports the House must determine.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Is not the report of the Committee on Elections unfinished business? I think my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] had commenced his argument upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he did not begin his argument.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire whether, under the ruling of the Chair, which seems to me entirely correct, a majority of the House has not control of its business?

The SPEAKER. Wholly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope that no further objection will be made to going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That of course takes precedence in submission to the House; precedence not only because it is a motion to suspend the rules, but because it relates to the public business.

Mr. COBURN. Allow me to suggest to the Chair a parliamentary inquiry which has been made by three or four gentlemen: whether or not, unless these matters be taken up to-day, they will be cut off?

The SPEAKER. They will not, because the orders in relation to them were made under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. COBURN. Then I ask for a session of the House to-night for the consideration of this election bill.

Mr. RANDALL. For debate only?

Mr. COBURN. I ask that the House will commence its consideration to-night.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot consent to that.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole upon the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the Chair consider me as having reported this morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so consider; but the gentleman loses no right that he had.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the House now goes into Committee of the Whole and rises at five o'clock this afternoon; can we not then take a recess until half past seven o'clock or any other hour and have a session at which can be raised the question of consideration upon any of these proposed subjects?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no reason why that cannot be done.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules and going into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill; and upon a division there were ayes 127.

Those voting in the negative rose to be counted; but, without announcing the number,

The SPEAKER said: There is evidently a large majority in the affirmative.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the vote on going into Committee of the Whole, I move that all general debate be limited to thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late, unless he ignores entirely what has been done so far. The House is now engaged in certifying the vote upon the motion of the gentleman to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole upon the sundry civil bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] asks that that certification be made by the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let the vote proceed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Butlinton, Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Finck, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunter, Robert S. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—101.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Berry, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Clinton L. Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Creamer, Eden, Farwell, Eugene Hale, Havens, Hays, Hendee, Holman, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Lofland, McLean, Mitchell, Morey, Nesmith, Orth, Pelham, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Rainey, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Rusk, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, J. Ambler Smith, Charles R. Thomas, Wheeler, William Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—39.

So the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COX said: I am paired off with General BUTLER on these and other matters. He has gone into the Supreme Court room; if present I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before going into Committee of the Whole, I ask consent that all general debate on this bill may be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. NIBLACK. I must object for the present. I want first to see what is the temper of the House on this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman suggest any time that will be satisfactory to him?

Mr. NIBLACK. I think we had better consider the bill, and after a while we can rise and limit debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would really prefer to fix some limit now in order to save time. If we come out of committee, some other business may intervene and delay us. I have suggested fifteen minutes as the limit. I will make it thirty minutes if the gentleman desires.

Mr. NIBLACK. We can tell better after a while what time will be needed for debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman speaking for himself will indicate how much time he wants, it may facilitate matters.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think we had better allow one hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I agree to one hour.

Mr. CESSNA. I object to one hour; it is too much.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] is anxious for the appropriation bills to get through, I hope he will not object to this arrangement.

Mr. CESSNA. I prefer that we should see if the House cannot fix a less time.

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. CESSNA.) O, no; withdraw your objection.

Mr. CESSNA. Well, I will agree to one hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to limiting general debate in Committee of the Whole to one hour; and that order will be made.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate on this bill has been limited to one hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HEREFORD. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I ask that the first reading be now proceeded with. I will, however, inquire of the Chair whether, if the reading be now had, it comes out of the hour allowed for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the impression of the Chair.

Mr. CESSNA. That is right; it is a good ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon further reflection the Chair believes he was mistaken, and now holds that the reading of the bill will not come out of the hour allowed for general debate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I withdraw my objection to dispensing with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the objection.

Mr. RANDALL. O, I hope not.

Mr. CESSNA. I make the motion that the committee do now rise so that the House may limit general debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. CESSNA. I know that; but I hope the gentleman will yield for this motion, as it appears that we are to consume two hours instead of one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire whether gentlemen on either side wish to take any time in general debate on this bill? I am anxious that we shall get fairly started in the work upon it. For myself I wish to occupy only ten or fifteen minutes in order to make a few general statements.

Mr. NIBLACK. So far as I am concerned, I did intend to occupy some time; but I find that I have not my documents and figures with me, having left them at my room. Hence I shall take an opportunity upon some other bill to submit my views.

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps the gentleman can do so under the five-minute rule.

Mr. NIBLACK. Perhaps so; but if not, I can wait another opportunity.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move then that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a point of order. It was agreed by unanimous consent that there should be one hour for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. It is entirely competent for the committee to rise at any time when it so desires.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD that the committee rise was agreed to, there being—ayes 104, noes 30.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited in Committee of the Whole to fifteen minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Say five minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a point of order. The House has already by unanimous consent fixed one hour as the time for general debate on this bill; and I submit that an order agreed to unanimously by the House cannot be changed.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the contrary, when the House has sometimes cut off all debate the committee has risen and an order has been made allowing time for debate. If the change can be made in one direction, it certainly can in the other. In Committee of the Whole I asked gentlemen on the other side whether they desired to speak; and if any one had indicated such a desire I would have interposed no objection.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We went into Committee of the Whole with the understanding, by unanimous consent, that one hour's debate should be allowed upon the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; debate was limited to one hour; it was not ordered that one hour absolutely should be allowed. I made the request that debate be limited to one hour.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As the gentleman knows perfectly well, the proposition was made that there should be one hour for debate. The question was raised whether a shorter time should not be fixed, and the gentleman consented that it should be an hour. The Chair then stated that he heard no objection.

The SPEAKER. The fact that the order was made by a unanimous vote does not change essentially the situation of the question except in this regard: that it is necessary to make a motion to reconsider in order to reverse the order already made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move to reconsider.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand the present occupant of the chair to have held repeatedly that where a proposition was agreed to by unanimous consent it could not be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so held, although he thinks that in his whole experience in this House he has never known the motion to reconsider to be made under these circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know that there is anything remarkable about it. I see no harm in making a precedent in favor of saving time.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the House to retrace its steps in less than an hour, except by general consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us facilitate the proceedings on this bill if we can.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I raise this point of order. When we voted to go into committee it was with the understanding that one hour should be devoted to general debate. Non constat that would not have been carried but for that understanding on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot rule on a contingency.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman from New York is mistaken about the fact. One hour was fixed as the limit after unanimous consent had been given.

Mr. GARFIELD. Unanimous consent had been given that debate should be closed, and the limitation was that it should not extend beyond an hour. We do not propose to do more than reduce that limitation upon the general debate. I put it in that way. If, however, there is any feeling about it, if gentlemen think it is repressing their rights of debate, I will not press it any further. I ask unanimous consent that general debate in committee on the appropriation bill shall be limited to fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks that general debate shall be limited in committee to fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. NIBLACK. I made the objection to limiting debate to fifteen minutes, thinking there were two or three gentlemen on this side who wished to speak; but I understand nobody is prepared to go on at this moment, and I therefore shall not make any further objection to limiting the time for general debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was on that statement of facts by the gentleman from Indiana I moved the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate for fifteen minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think we should understand before we go into committee whether the first reading of this bill for information has been dispensed with, or whether it is to be insisted upon. If the reading of the entire bill for information shall be insisted on, that of itself will take nearly an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is no objection to limiting general debate in Committee of the Whole to fifteeen minutes.

Mr. COX. I should like to have the ruling of the Chair on my point.

The SPEAKER. What is the point?

Mr. COX. Whether, after unanimous consent has been granted for general debate in committee for one hour, the gentleman can move to rise and come back into the House and cut off debate which was agreed to by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The limitation to fifteen minutes has been done by general consent. The Chair has not ruled otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House general debate has been limited on this bill to fifteen minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish very briefly to call the attention of the House to some things which ought to be understood.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill, before he proceeds, allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HEREFORD. What is the gross amount of appropriations in this bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask gentlemen to send to the document-room for the report of the Committee on Appropriations accompanying this sundry civil appropriation bill. It is report 149. Upon the third page of that report the gentleman from West Virginia will find in detail the amount of the various items of this bill, which make a total of $25,285,978.38; of which nearly $200,000 is to be paid by the national banks and not by the Treasury, for the amount referred to is a provision to carry out the requirements of the bill for the redemption and reissue of national-bank currency.

And now, while gentlemen are getting the bill and the accompanying report, I will make a few general reflections on the old but important subject of APPROPRIATIONS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. Chairman, we have now so nearly reached the end of the long journey through the annual appropriation bills of the session that I am able to state with approximate accuracy the result of the labors of the Committee on Appropriations, and the amounts voted and to be voted by Congress for the public service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876. This aggregate will be of special interest in its relations to the appropriations of recent years, and because the year for which we are now appropriating is the centennial anniversary of our national life.

Did the time permit I should be glad to institute a comparison between the expenditures of the Continental Colonies in 1776, and the great Government for which we are now providing. But the pressure of public business forbids me to consume the waning moments of this session in such a review.

I shall therefore confine my remarks to the consideration of the appropriations of the present session and their relation to the appropriations of recent years.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a very important bill, and I ask for order, so that we may hear what is said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before entering upon this, however, I will call attention to estimates I had the honor to submit at the last session in my speeches of March 5, 1874, and near the close of the session, June 23, 1874. I do this because both here and in the public press it has been charged that the estimated reduction of appropriations and expenses was exaggerated in amount for party purposes.

REDUCTIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1875.

When the legislative bill was brought before the House for action on the 5th of March, 1874, I proposed a plan of reduction of expenditure in the several Departments of the Government, and in summing up the proposed result I used these words, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

What Congress will do in reference to the centennial exhibition and in reference to the estimates for the board of public works, and how much will be appropriated in the form of relief bills, claim bills, and pension bills, members of the House can estimate as well as I.

These things ought to be fairly considered by the House and determined on their merits.

It is therefore impossible to say what figure will represent the ultimate amount of reduction. But I believe I am reasonably safe in saying that we can reduce the expenditures, exclusive of the sinking fund, to $270,000,000 for next year, provided the House sustain the Committee on Appropriations as they have done in the bills already reported.

It was somewhat hazardous, at that early period of the session, to name the amount to which the twelve annual bills, the numerous relief acts, and the permanent appropriations would be limited; and for this reason it is specially gratifying to me to find that my estimate was very near the actual amount as subsequently ascertained by the Treasury Department, when all the appropriations were analyzed and footed up.

In the book published by the Secretary of the Treasury, entitled "Digest of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875," will be found, on page 156, a summary of all the appropriations made at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, amounting in the aggregate to $155,017,758.20. To this should be added the permanent appropriations for the same year. On page 150 of the Book of Estimates of last year the total estimate of all the permanent appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1875, were $147,859,230.76; this aggregate contained the expenses of the national loan, which for the previous year amounted to $2,806,863.94, and which was at the last session taken from the list of permanent appropriations and placed in the annual bills. Subtracting this sum and also the sinking fund, (estimated last year at $29,918,856,) it left the net amount of permanent appropriations for the fiscal year 1875, $115,133,510.82; total annual and permanent for 1875, $270,226,906.62.

My estimate of March 5, 1874, exclusive of the sinking fund, was $270,000,000. The actual amount was less than a quarter of a million in excess of the estimate.

In my speech of June 23, 1874, I gave a summary of the amounts appropriated in the twelve annual bills passed at the session then closing, which, compared with the amounts appropriated in the corresponding bills for the previous year, showed an aggregate reduction of $26,863,006.96. After stating that I had not taken into account the $4,000,000 appropriated in what was known as the "naval emergency bill," nor the various relief acts, I made the following remarks, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The summing up of the amounts appropriated in the bills that have passed within the last day or two has been done somewhat hurriedly, and I will not vouch for the absolute correctness of the figures here given; but I am satisfied they are not far out of the way. I may safely affirm that the appropriations made at the present session of Congress are in the aggregate $25,000,000 less than those of last year. I ought also to add that this statement no account has been taken of the unexpended balances in either year.

I now call attention to this statement, as compared with the actual results when all the appropriations of the sessions were ascertained.

I here copy from page 156 of the Treasury digest of appropriations for 1875 the detailed statement of all the appropriations made during the third session of the Forty-second Congress, and the first session of the Forty-third Congress:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Warrant Division, July 1, 1874.

* There appears for the first time in this bill an appropriation of $2,216,763 for defraying expenses incident to the national loan for the current fiscal year, the appropriations for that object having heretofore been indefinite. There also appears an appropriation for official postage-stamps required by the various Departments of $1,865,900 in 1874, and $1,707,600 in 1875, without any corresponding appropriation in 1873. To arrive at a just comparison of the appropriations made at each session of Congress the amounts appropriated for postage and expenses of national loan in 1875 and for postage in 1874 should be deducted from the totals of those years, leaving the amended totals.

This table shows a reduction of $19,331,405.62.

In the note appended to it, the Secretary properly states that for the first time the annual bills of the last session contained $2,216,763 for expenses of the national loan.

But the amount expended in the preceding year for the same purpose was $2,806,863.94; and the last session of Congress should have been credited with a further reduction to the amount of the difference between these sums, namely, $590,100.94. This item, added to the amount of reduction stated by the Secretary, gives a reduction of $19,923,506.56.

The difference between this amount and the amount estimated in my speech of June 23, 1874, consists in the two items, which, as I then stated, were not included in my estimate. One was the $4,000,000 appropriated for the naval emergency arising from our trouble with Spain, which should not be considered as a part of the ordinary cost of carrying on the Government; the other was the aggregate of all the relief and pension acts passed at the last session, which amounted to $2,121,540.86; these acts were not under the charge of the Committee on Appropriations, and they amounted to a larger sum than I supposed they would.

But including the relief acts, and leaving out the naval emergency appropriation, the actual reduction in the ordinary appropriations for the public service at the last session was $24,000,000 less than at the preceding session. I expressed the opinion that it would turn out to be $25,000,000. I am content to let the facts speak for themselves. It was a difficult work to bring down the aggregate by so large a sum; but it was done in the interest of economy, and its value to the Treasury and the country cannot be impaired by the ungracious and unjust attempts which have been made to belittle the work.

Before leaving this subject, I desire to say that during the last session it was frequently asserted here that these reductions were intended only for political effect, and would be followed by deficiency bills to a corresponding amount. To these assertions I am now able to respond by pointing to the fact that the deficiencies for this year will be less than for any year since the war began.

I have compiled a table of deficiency appropriations for each year since 1869, which is a conclusive answer to all the insinuations on this subject:

	Deficiency.
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1870	$23,000,000
June 30, 1871	22,000,000
June 30, 1872	14,000,000
June 30, 1873	6,500,000

We have gone far enough in the examination of the necessary deficiencies of this year to be satisfied that they will be considerably less than those of last year.

This fact is a conclusive answer to all the doubts and insinuations suggested in regard to the reductions made at the last session. In many cases the retrenchment bore heavily upon individuals and Departments of the Government; but I am gratified to see that in the Treasury Department, where the largest reduction was made, the public service suffered no injury thereby. In his annual report the Secretary of the Treasury says that—

So far as the estimates relate to the Treasury Department he has required them to be kept within the appropriations of the last session. * * * He is gratified to be able to express the opinion that such reduction has not affected injuriously the public interests confided to his care, nor has it tended to obstruct or delay the public business.

APPROPRIATIONS AT THE PRESENT SESSION.

During the present session the Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to pursue the line of policy which they marked out one year ago, and they have still further reduced the appropriations wherever they have found it practical. So many of the bills are still unfinished that I am not able to state with accuracy the difference between the aggregate of appropriations at this session and those of the last, but I present herewith a statement of the amounts appropriated in the regular bills of last session and the corresponding bills of this session as they now stand. Some of them have become laws, some have passed both Houses and are now in conference committees, others have passed the House and are still under consideration in the Senate, and two, the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill, have yet to be acted on in the House.

In some branches of the public service there has been an increase; but that increase has been made necessary by the growth of the public business itself, and is in itself a healthy indication.

The business of the Post-Office Department has very considerably increased during the current year, and an increased appropriation for that service of nearly a million and a half has been found necessary. The committee made an earnest effort to devise some means by which this growing deficiency could be avoided. It is hoped that the new rates of postage provided at the last session will increase the revenues of that Department; but the law has not yet been in operation a sufficient time to exhibit its full effects.

The Army and Navy bills have been kept very nearly at the reduced aggregates of last year, the $4,000,000 extraordinary appropriation for the Navy at the last year not being repeated in the bill of this year.

The aggregate appropriations for the Military Academy, for fortifications, and for pensions are nearly the same as last year.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Will the gentleman tell me why the fortification bill is less than last year? Does he not propose to take appropriations already granted by this House, and transfer them to another branch of the service for rifling guns and other ordnance materials?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the question when that clause of the bill is reached.

The consular and diplomatic bill shows a reduction of about $2,000,000, the amount appropriated last year for paying the award of the mixed claims commission.

The Indian bill with the Senate additions shows a reduction of about one million.

The aggregate amount of the legislative and sundry civil bills as they now stand show a reduction of about two millions, but this will probably be less before they become laws.

I think the deficiency bill will be less than that of last year by about one million.

The river and harbor bill as it passed the House shows an increase over that of last year of about $750,000.

I have copied from the Treasury digest already referred to the list of appropriations made at the last session, and have set opposite them the corresponding appropriations made and pending at the present session. I have indicated in the table the present status of each bill. I have no means of knowing what the aggregate of relief acts for the session will be, but I estimate them the same as for last year.

Annual appropriation bills.

Appropriation bills.	For fiscal year 1875.	For fiscal year 1876.	Remarks.
Legislative	$20,758,255 50	$19,613,643 99	In conference.
Army	27,788,500 00	27,701,500 00	In the Senate.
Navy	20,813,946 70	16,976,006 40	Now a law.
Indian	5,538,274 87	4,855,507 57	In conference.
Fort	904,000 00	850,000 00	Now a law.
Consular	3,404,804 00	1,344,785 00	Now a law.
Military Academy	339,835 00	364,740 00	Now a law.
Post-Office	7,175,542 00	8,356,000 00	In the Senate.
Pensions	29,980,000 00	30,000,000 00	In the Senate.
River and harbor	5,228,000 00	5,999,200 00	In the Senate.
Sundry civil	26,911,246 88	25,285,978 38	In the House.
Deficiency, (estimated)	4,053,812 39	3,000,000 00	In Committee on Appropriations.
Relief acts, (estimated)	2,121,504 00	2,121,540 86
Total	155,017,758 20	147,458,902 20

Estimated total decrease below annual bills of last session, $7,558,856.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the permanent appropriations for 1876 at about $1,200,000 less than those for 1875.

This would indicate an aggregate reduction in appropriations of all kinds of about $8,500,000. The actual reduction will be not far from this amount either way, unless some unusual demands are made upon the Treasury by the legislation of the remaining days of this session.

EXPENDITURES.

It is still more difficult to forecast the expenditures, but we may reasonably expect a considerable reduction below those of the current year.

For several years past I have made a careful analysis of the actual expenditures of the Government as shown by the books of the Treasury. Last year I presented an analysis for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873. I here reproduce that, and add to it under the same arrangement an analysis of the expenditures for the last fiscal year, the year ending June 30, 1874.

Here, as in the former analysis, I have grouped expenditures into three classes: First, those payments that were made directly on account of the war; second, the expenses of the Army and the Navy; third, all other expenses, including the civil establishment and public works. This comparative statement I think will be of value in studying the character and tendency of our public service.

Comparing these three general groups of expenses in the analyses which I made for the three years 1871, 1873, and 1874, the result stands as follows:

Total expenditures by years.

	1871.	1873.	1874.
FIRST GROUP.
Amount paid directly on account of the late war	$175, 543, 140 27	$157, 262, 415 81	$154, 171, 130 50
Per cent. of the whole for each year	60.5	54	53.3
SECOND GROUP.
Army and Navy	45, 114, 551 46	53, 998, 982 25	58, 693, 305 69
Per cent. of the whole for each year	14	18	20.4
THIRD GROUP.
Civil service proper	70, 906, 749 70	79, 083, 847 27	74, 269, 473 57
Totals	291, 564, 441 43	290, 345, 245 33	287, 133, 909 76

A comparison of the amounts expended in the three years named under the first group shows how slowly the expenditures growing out of the late war are reduced. In 1871, they were 60¼ per cent. of all our expenses; in 1874 they were still nearly 54 per cent. of the whole.

Much the largest item in this group is of course the interest on the public debt, which can only be decreased by refunding at a lower rate of interest and by payments of the principal.

Let it then be understood that the interest on the public debt, the pensions, the back pay and bounties of volunteers, and all that goes to make up the expenses which the war made necessary, even yet make nearly 54 per cent. of the total expenses of this Government. This table shows by percentages how the Army and Navy expenses have run, and how the civil expenses have run. Now, when gentlemen think we can cut down the expenditures by a very large sum, say $50,000,000, as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] they must inquire what items in this list of these expenditures they can strike out. In the civil service the percentages run thus:

The cost of the civil service proper, including all public buildings, was about seventy-one millions in 1871; in 1873 it was seventy-nine millions; and in 1874 it was a little more than seventy-four millions, about one-quarter of all the expenses of the Government. During the fiscal year 1874 nearly 54 per cent. of our expenses were on account of the late war, 20½ per cent. for our Army and Navy, and about 25½ per cent. for our other expenses.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my colleague allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does his statement include the appropriations for the claims allowed by the commissioners of claims?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does. They are all included in the war expenses.

Mr. LAWRENCE. One thing further. Here are what are known as the 4th of July claims, reported from the Treasury Department under the act of June 16, 1874, which requires them to be examined according to the act of July 4, 1864—claims for quartermaster stores and commissary stores, furnished during the war, to the amount of $112,659.60.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is since this fiscal year began and does not appear in my analysis.

Mr. LAWRENCE. These claims have to be provided for by this Congress, and there is a bill from the Committee on War Claims proposing to make appropriation to pay them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; but that is aside from the pending discussion. I return to the point from which this colloquy diverted me.

I wish to call attention to one class of our expenditures which depend mainly upon the yearly acts of Congress. Referring to the table it will be seen that the third group of expenditures includes the cost of maintaining the civil departments of the Government, and also the expenditures made upon the various public works of the country, which have become a very large item of our public expenditures. The Committee on Appropriations have found it extremely difficult either to reduce or limit this class of expenditures; especially those relating to public buildings. The pressure of local interests to secure such buildings is at all times very strong; but the Committee on Appropriations, during the last two years especially, resisted the efforts to secure appropriations for buildings not already begun.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS UNDER THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT OF THE TREASURY.

But great as the appropriations for public buildings have been, the amounts have been greatly exaggerated in the public mind.

I desire to call attention to an article published in the New York Tribune on the 21st of January, 1875, which, as a whole, is a great exaggeration in regard to these appropriations. The portion of the article to which I refer is as follows:

Without further preface we will submit a portion of the evidence upon which we base our conclusions.

1. The expenditures for public buildings during the year ending June 30, 1873, were $9,039,698.76, and for the year ending June 30, 1874, they were, as near as we can get at them, $7,956,208.

2. On the 1st of July, 1873, the balance of appropriations standing to the credit of the office of Supervising Architect and available for work on public buildings amounted to no less than $14,774,573, as we learn from page 35 of Secretary Richardson's report of that year.

3. The total of the appropriations for public buildings made at the last session of Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was $8,356,525. (See Tribune Almanac for 1875, page 24.)

4. By special enactment of the same Congress all former appropriations for public buildings remain valid until the Secretary of the Treasury can "raise the wind." (See chapter 476 of the acts of the present Congress, first session.)

5. The sum total of the balances to the credit of the Supervising Architect on the 1st of July, 1873, being $14,774,573, added to the $8,356,525 of fresh appropriations made in 1874, gives an aggregate of $23,131,098; from which deduct the $7,956,208 expended during the last fiscal year, and we have left $15,174,890 as the sum standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect on the 1st of July, 1874.

6. From the above summary it appears that although the appropriations made for public buildings were $12,341,944 for the year ending June 30, 1874, and only $8,356,525 for the current fiscal year, the sum at the disposal of the Supervising Architect was actually $400,000 greater for the current fiscal year than for the year preceding, and that so far from the reduced appropriation being any guarantee of reduced expenditure, as claimed in speeches made at the close of the last session of Congress, the effect of the legislation at that session was to place at the disposal of the Supervising Architect a sum which is nearly double his expenditures for the previous year.

7. The vast sum of $15,000,000 which the Supervising Architect is authorized to expend cannot, of course, be expended in the present state of the revenue without an increase of the public debt. Hence the significance of the modest requests which the President is making for an increase of taxation.

Soon after I read this article I requested the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish an official statement covering the whole subject. I append his reply, which inclosed an official table, showing in detail the expenditures on each of the public buildings under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and the amounts expended in 1873 and 1874 and the amount appropriated for 1875:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, in which you ask that the following information be furnished you:

1. Actual expenditure on account of public buildings for 1873 and 1874.

2. Balances available for public buildings July 1, 1874, including appropriations for 1875.

3. Balances of appropriations for public buildings January 20, 1875.

In compliance with your request the statement desired by you is herewith inclosed.

The amount, $14,774,573, which is stated on page xxxv of the finance report for 1873 to be the sum of the balances of appropriations standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect's office July 1, 1873, includes the appropriations for the fiscal year 1874, which were made available immediately upon the approval of the act, (17 Statutes at Large, 524) namely, March 3, 1873.

I am, very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

From this official record it will be seen—

1. That the expenditures for public buildings during the year ending June 30, 1873, where, for construction, $7,965,564.47, and for repairs, preservation, heating-apparatus, vaults, safes, and locks, $345,742.22; making a total of $8,320,306.69, instead of $9,039,698.76, stated by the Tribune.

2. The balances of appropriations standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury July 1, 1873, amounting to $14,774,537, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury on page 35 of the finance report for 1873, included the $7,989,706.50 for construction and the $524,876.50 for repairs and preservation, heating-apparatus, vaults, safes, &c.—total $8,514,583.05—the total of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, which were made available on the passage of the act. The whole was available at that date. The Tribune has therefore overstated the amount by more than eight and a half millions.

3. The appropriations for public buildings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, were: For construction, $7,116,523,81; and for repairs, furniture, heating-apparatus, vaults, safes, locks, &c., $475,000—total, $7,591,523.31, and not $8,356,525 as stated by the Tribune.

4. The clause of the statutes referred to by the Tribune making appropriations for public buildings available until they are used was put on by the House against the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

5. The unexpended balances of former appropriations which remained to the credit of the Supervising Architect July 1, 1873, added to the total appropriation for 1874, amounted to $12,194,791.17, and not $23,131,098 as stated by the Tribune.

6. The total appropriations made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, including construction, repair, preservation, heating-apparatus, vaults, locks, &c., was $7,591,523.81, and not $12,341,944 as stated by the Tribune.

7. The balances standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect January 20, 1875, for all purposes was $5,803,089.80, and not $15,000,000 as stated by the Tribune.

For many years Congress has made the appropriations for public buildings available immediately in order that the work may be commenced early in the season. If this were not done it would confine the work to the last half of the year and push much of it into bad weather of the fall and winter.

But I think the Congress needs to be warned of the danger of pressing too fast and too far in the matter of public buildings. This seems to be a marked tendency of all modern governments. It played a large part in the work of swamping the French government under the late emperor.

I have examined the recent French budgets, and have found that during thirteen years, in each of which an average of $12,000,000 of surplus was promised, each resulted in a deficit. In the thirteen years prior to 1870 there was an average deficit of $15,000,000. The increase of their expenditures on public works is illustrated by the fact that in 1853 they amounted to $21,000,000, in 1859 to $34,500,000, in 1866 to $40,000,000, and in 1870 to a still larger sum.

Warned by such examples and by the manifest tendency in our own Government to extravagance in any matter of public works, the Committee on Appropriations have sought to so limit our expenditures for public buildings that they shall not in any one year bear an unreasonable proportion to other expenses. There are now twenty-four buildings in progress under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and some fourteen others authorized, but not yet commenced. The Committee on Appropriations believe that we ought not to add new buildings to this list until some of those now under way are finished.

But what is far more important than that, the Committee on Appropriations believe it is of the utmost importance to regulate by law the expenditures upon all new buildings, so that the plans may not be changed and the cost increased far beyond the ordinary limit fixed by Congress. In almost every public building the original limitation has been almost wholly disregarded. And we have placed in this bill a clause which, if it becomes a part of a law, will forbid the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay any money except on an official certificate that it is in pursuance of a plan within the limitations fixed by law.

Before closing the general discussion I wish to refer to a complaint which I have heard in several quarters, that the Committee on Appropriations have erred in their habit of introducing the general legislation on appropriation bills. This would be a just complaint if it were true that the committee had introduced general legislation not germane to the subject of public expenditures. But I venture to claim it as a ground of especial credit to the Committee on Appropriations that they have in many ways limited and reduced expenditures by legislative clauses to correct abuses and bring the expenditures of the Government directly under the eye of Congress, and subject them to the annual scrutiny of both Houses The legislation placed upon our bills has in almost every instance been directed to the single purpose of putting the expenditures of the Government into so plain a business shape that the ordinary citizen can understand them.

If time were allowed me, I should be glad to enumerate the reforms in the method of transacting the public business and the economy in the public expenditures which have been inaugurated by the Committee on Appropriations during the last four years by means of general legislation. This has been done in no spirit of interference with the rights of other committees of the House, but because in the course of our investigation the necessity for such reforms has been made clearly apparent to us. And now, Mr. Chairman, I will omit any further remarks upon the provisions of this bill until we come to its consideration paragraph by paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill is concluded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

Public printing and binding:

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, $1,625,507.66; and out of the sum hereby appropriated, printing and binding may be done by the Congressional Printer to the amounts following, namely.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by reducing the appropriation $25,000. I do so because upon examination I find the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill in this paragraph for the next fiscal year is only $20,000 less than was appropriated at the last session of Congress for the current fiscal year. In view of the fact that the franking privilege has been abolished, and that in consequence thereof the House has reduced enormously the printing of public documents, which I believe to be the case, I think the proposed reduction is entirely too small. The amount appropriated last year was $1,645,000, while this year, notwithstanding the reduction in the amount of printing, to which I have directed the attention of this committee, it is proposed to appropriate $1,625,000 for this purpose. There is either something wrong about this matter, or else the number of public documents has not been reduced so largely as we had supposed. I would like to have some explanation given, in view of these facts, why this appropriation is kept up so enormously high.

Mr. GARFIELD. Gentlemen will remember that we are now appropriating for a long session of Congress. This bill relates to next winter, to the next long session, when the estimates for the RECORD alone are double the amount that they were for this session. The gentleman of course will recognize that as a necessary increase.

Mr. RANDALL. I do; that is a partial reason for this increase.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the next place, during the seven months of the next session there will also be a very much larger amount of congressional matter to be printed than in the short session. The reductions which we have made from the estimates were considered by the Public Printer as too great. They were made chiefly on the ground, after going carefully over the estimates, that there was a considerable reduction in the price of paper and other material. We believe there will be more printing to do the next year than this year.

And in this connection I ought to remark that we have made this recommendation in the bill on the supposition that there will not be so much printing ordered by the Senate as has been ordered by the House. The Public Printer tells us that should the Agricultural Reports, the order for printing which has passed the House and been sent to the Senate, be concurred in by the Senate, there will be required for that alone $200,000 more than is here recommended.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman makes a distinction between the cost of printing for the present session of Congress and the next session.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I would like to ask this question: The appropriation recommended here is about the same in amount as the appropriation made last year for the same purpose. I would like to know whether the appropriation for the current year has been exhausted? If the appropriations running through a short session have not been exhausted, and the franking privilege being abolished, why should there not have been a reduction, because of abolishing the franking privilege, in the expenses of this year? Why should there not have been a surplus left in the Treasury out of the appropriation for this year?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that the documents printed during this year were, many of them, legacies from the old days of franking. A very large portion of the documents ordered to be printed just before the franking privilege was abolished were really printed this year.

Mr. RANDALL. And paid for this year?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; and the Public Printer tells me that he will run very close to the amount appropriated.

Mr. RANDALL. One question more. What sort of check or mode of voucher is adopted in reference to the expenditure of this large sum of money by the Public Printer? Where is the check, or is there any on him? Who examines his accounts?

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first place the accounts of the Public Printer are under the general control of the Joint Committee on Printing; that is, his expenditures are. In the next place they pass through the regular accounting officers of the Treasury like all other accounts. Then, as the gentleman will remember, we put a further check upon him in a bill two years ago, in assigning a limit to the printing for each Department, and requiring him to give an actual statement of the cost of the printing done for each Department. There is a sort of rivalry among the Departments to get their work done as cheaply as possible. Hence they scan the accounts of the Public Printer very carefully.

Mr. RANDALL. I have never seen any report upon this subject, so far as I recollect, from the Committee on Printing. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend by striking out the last word. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] occupied all the time allotted by the House for general discussion; therefore I am obliged to avail myself of this formal amendment in order to say a few words in reply.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that I would have been glad to give gentlemen on the other side as much time as they desired, but they did not indicate any wish in the matter.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Ohio, now as upon previous occasions, has with some degree of self-congratulation (and I concede not without some foundation) claimed that, so far as he and his committee are concerned, they have made an earnest effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government. I will take this occasion to say that I believe the gentleman and his committee have endeavored to reduce the expenses of the Government. But I apprehend that the gentleman in his statement of last summer, in which he claimed a reduction of $26,000,000, was entirely at fault in point of fact, as the sequel now proves. The gentleman, while claiming an intention to reduce appropriations, always finally consents to the contrary of reduction when the bills are about to pass both Houses and become laws. Because, sir, whatever his committee may report in the line of reduction, and whatever this House may agree to, the Senate invariably has added large amounts to our appropriation bills; and when they have been returned to us this House—too frequently with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—has assented to these increased appropriations. But, sir, be that as it may, it is a very singular fact, a fact of which I challenge contradiction, that the annual expenditures of the Government—I am not now speaking of appropriations or estimates of reduced appropriations or reduced estimates—the figures and the records show that the annual expenditures of the Government have not been reduced at all; and, sir, it is the expenditures, not economical professions, with which the people of this country have to deal. It is the effect of legislation as finally felt in taxation that concerns them. I declare here that there is next to no reduction of the annual expenditures of the Government outside of the reduction in the appropriation to pay the annual interest to bondholders. I affirm that in the War Department there has been no decrease of the expenditures; that now, nine years after the war, we are keeping up all the paraphernalia of war, with all the attendant contingent expenses necessary to a time of war; that to-day our Army in its number of officers is larger in proportion to the rank and file than that of any other nation anywhere; that while we have reduced the rank and file, the number of officers is improperly and unjustly disproportionate; that in Washington to-day we have an expenditure of probably over $100,000 going to officers who are in the discharge of no duty whatever or who are performing merely the duty of civilians. I hope the time will speedily come when there will be an earnest, honest, resolute effort made in the line of economy, so as to produce an absolute reduction of the expenditures of the Government, which are now, in my judgment, at least $30,000,000 too much. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment with the view to ask one question. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether I understood him aright as to the discrepancy between his speech of last session on economy and the actual saving to the Government during the past year. What was the amount of discrepancy to which the gentleman confessed just now?

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not make any confession except to this extent: I called attention to the fact that I distinctly excluded from my statement two things. One was the amount of the various relief acts, with which I had nothing to do and as to the aggregate of which we could know nothing until the year was over. I expressed the opinion, as given to me in a statement of the Clerk of the House, that those bills would probably amount to less than one million and a half of dollars. In that I was mistaken, for they summed up about two million and a quarter of dollars. I also distinctly excluded from my statement the $4,000,000 appropriated for the Navy as a special emergency fund, and not coming in regularly as one of the current ordinary expenses of the Government. The actual reduction, counting in all things, is $20,000,000. The putting in of the $4,000,000 emergency appropriation and the $2,250,000 for relief bills has caused the apparent discrepancy; and both of those things were referred to in my former remarks.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio made his remarks at the end of the session—on the very last day—the 23d of June, 1874, just before the session closed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman at that time must have known all about the expenses of the Navy and all about the probable expenses for those relief bills. As we charged at that time (and the gentleman might as well be frank about it) the very rosy character of his statement was because it was made before the election, while his present statement is made after the election; and I think the latter statement is the best.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think they are both very good.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] insist on his amendment?

Mr. COX. O, no.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Court of Claims, $12,000; for the Department of State, $25,000; for the Treasury Department, $300,000; for the War Department, $120,000; for the Navy Department, $65,000; for the Interior Department, $225,000; for the Agricultural Department, $15,000; for the Department of Justice and the Attorney-General's Office, $10,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $25,000; for the supreme court of the District or Columbia, $5,000; for the Post-Office Department, $175,000; and for both Houses of Congress, $648,507.66.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out in nineteenth line the words "and twenty," so that the appropriation for the War Department will be $100,000. This is the same amount that was appropriated last year; and I know of no reason why we should appropriate this year for that Department 20 per cent. more than we appropriated last year for the same purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that the distribution of this fund was a somewhat conjectural matter; we had no guide to go by.

Mr. RANDALL. But last year you made the appropriation $100,000; and now you ask $120,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The signal service sent in a special estimate desiring us to give them $70,000. That service requires a much larger sum for printing than we have given before. The work now is much larger.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me an enormous sum of money; that is, to appropriate $120,000 for printing here.

Mr. GARFIELD. They report on all rivers and harbors. It is for printing engineer's reports and reports of surveys. It is for printing surveys like the Wheeler expedition. It is, besides, for the printing of blanks, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. How much was expended by the War Department last year for this printing?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not the full amount expended for printing last year. The statement made by the committee was that the demand for more printing came from the printing of weather reports.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to let my amendment be adopted, and we can come back to this subject when it is ascertained what the War Department expended last year for this printing. I tell the gentleman that I will not be factious in reference to the question at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. My amendment is to reduce the appropriation to $100,000, which is the same as last year, with the proviso that there shall not be any increase. If we can get the fact of how much was expended last year for this printing, we will then know exactly upon what to base our appropriation. The gentleman has my word that I will not interpose any objection if my amendment is allowed to be adopted. If after the amendment has been adopted and the exact facts have been ascertained the gentleman from Ohio can show me reasonable cause for any increase of this appropriation beyond what was appropriated last year, I will very readily go with him.

Mr. GARFIELD. Leave it the other way, the gentleman withdrawing his amendment and having the right to go back and offer it at any time when the facts have been ascertained.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If gentlemen will look at page 4 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations, they will see a letter from General Myers, chief of the Signal Service, in regard to this whole question.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment on the understanding I shall have the privilege of going back and moving it again hereafter.

Mr. LAMPORT. I move in line 23 to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five;" so it will read:

For the Agricultural Department, $25,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for this reason: The committee reported last year in favor of $20,000 for this printing for the Agricultural Department. It was entirely insufficient for the purposes of that Department. Formerly the appropriation was $25,000. The Commissioner of Agriculture has sent me a communication, in which he informs me that he cannot get along with the printing of that Department short of $25,000, which is the amount he has heretofore had for the same purpose. As I have said, last year it was cut down to $20,000, and he had to forego the printing of very important matter.

Gentlemen of the House will see that the printing in the Agricultural Department is actually necessary. It is for the printing of labels and the monthly record, &c. Twenty-five thousand dollars are absolutely necessary to carry out the useful objects of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will not pass that amendment. Almost all the printing of that Department is by special order of Congress.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 60.

Mr. LAMPORT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAMPORT, and Mr. SAYLER of Indiana, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 31, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STORM. I move at the end of line 30 to add the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all printing of records and briefs of suits in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court of the United States shall be done at the expense of the parties thereto, except the record for the United States when the United States is a party, and the brief of the attorney for the United States.

Mr. STORM. I think no gentleman in this House will object to that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that amendment is new legislation and not in order to this bill.

Mr. STORM. It is not new legislation. The gentleman from Ohio says it is. Let him state in what respect it is new legislation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is a clear case of new legislation, in my judgment. The law now is that the United States shall print the record of cases sent up on appeal.

Mr. STORM. There is no law whatever which compels the United States to be at the expense of printing the record, evidence, and briefs of attorneys in private cases. I am simply putting a limitation or restriction upon the appropriation. I contend that Chief Justice Drake, when he made the order requiring records in private cases to be printed at the expense of the United States, had not any authority of law for so doing. There is no law authorizing any such printing, and I move to add the proviso as a limitation on this appropriation. I submit the amendment is in order. It is a well-known fact that there are cases in which the United States is not a party in any way, and testimony to be taken in such cases, perhaps in Kansas, is printed at the expense of the Government. I wish to know whether the gentleman contends there is any law authorizing the payment by the United States for the printing of the testimony, the record, and the briefs of attorneys in cases where the United States is not a party? That is what is done at present; and I wish this simply as a limitation to the appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say to my friend opposite that this is exactly what the United States have to do.

Mr. STORM. But not in pursuance of law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes. By law.

Mr. STORM. I would like to see the law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to state it first, and then we will see if I can make my statement good. Not the testimony, not the briefs of the lawyers, nothing but the record in the Supreme Court is printed by the order of the United States. In the Court of Claims the record is printed. In the court of Alabama claims—that is not provided for by law, in the other two it is—in the court of Alabama claims they allow only the printing of records where the claim is less than a thousand dollars, so as to cover the cases of sailors and others who are poor; but in all cases where the claim is over a thousand dollars, then the claimants have to do the printing themselves. And as that comes to an equal distribution all over the country for all suitors, it does not make any odds whether the country pays or whether it is paid by a charge on the individual.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not familiar with the law, which one side states in one way and the other side in another way. The Chair desires either to see the law or to submit the question to the action of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let it be put to the vote.

Mr. STORM. All right.

The question being taken on Mr. STORM'S amendment, there were ayes 33, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I offer the following amendment:

In line 16 strike out "$12,000" and insert "$8,000;" so that it will read: "For the Court of Claims, $8,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25 strike out "$25,000" and insert "$15,000;" so it will read: "For the Supreme Court of the United States, $15,000."

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on that amendment. My colleague well remarks that the abolition of the franking privilege, instead of having reduced public printing, has apparently had no effect whatever upon the amount of public printing that has been done. It ought to have reduced the public printing more than one-half, but it has had no such effect.

It seems we have been going on and ordering books to be printed at the expense of the Government without any regard to the fact whether those books would ever be sent to the parties intended to be benefited by them; so that I believe now the vaults of this Capitol are piled up with documents and books never intended to be sent out and that never will be sent out, but which lie there moldering and rotting. I was one of those who believed that the abolition of the franking privilege would operate to a large diminution in the amount of public printing. But it seems such has not been the case, and I apprehend, where we have a large establishment like the Public Printing Office, with a large number of men employed, with a large number of presses and costly machinery of every kind used in printing, it would be almost impossible for us to substantially reduce the amount of appropriations that will be required year after year for this public printing.

I desire also to say this; that there has been a dispute as to whether we have been saving any money by the present method of printing and publishing the debates of Congress. The Public Printer appeared before a committee that had that matter under investigation, and he declared that he had no books and had nothing to show what was the actual amount of the cost of doing this printing. He said he had charged the amount of printing according to his estimates. He had made his estimates and charged the amount of printing according to them, and not with any reference at all to the actual cost.

But the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] introduced a resolution and had it passed which required the Public Printer to give a detailed statement of the amount of cost of printing the debates. Now, the Public Printer has not done that. He has made his report, and we are just as ignorant to-day as we were one year ago as to what is the cost of printing the debates of Congress. And I say that until he makes a report showing us what is the actual cost of printing these debates, which he alleged he could print cheaper than Messrs. Rives & Bailey could, thereby causing the contract to be taken from them, Congress ought to withhold any appropriation for that purpose until the Congressional Printer shows what becomes of the money. Let there be no appropriation until he shows, by rendering a proper account here, what is actually the cost of printing the debates. The annual report of the Public Printer does not show that fact, but leaves it as much in doubt and obscurity as before. The Government is now doing a general publishing business. It prints for all the Departments of the Government. It prints and binds books for private individuals; it prints speeches for members of Congress, and publishes an official gazette. I hope the day is not far distant when the Government will cease to publish a book and thus interfere with the private affairs of individuals.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I oppose the amendment and ask for a vote upon it.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. STORM, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For life-saving and life-boat stations:

For salaries of two superintendents of the life-saving stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey, at $1,500 each; one assistant to superintendent on the coast of Long Island, $500; for one superintendent on the coast of Massachusetts, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coasts of Maine and New Hampshire, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coasts of Virginia and North Carolina, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coasts of Delaware and Virginia, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coast of Florida, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coasts of Lakes Erie and Ontario, $1,000; for one superintendent on the coasts of Lakes Huron and Superior, $1,000; and for one superintendent for the life-saving stations on the coast of Lake Michigan, $1,000; in all, $11,500.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why there is an increase of this appropriation from $6,000 last year to $11,500 this year?

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague on the committee from Maine [Mr. HALE] had charge of this subject, and can answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I had charge of this part of the bill and if the gentleman will revive his recollection he will remember that last year on the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce the House passed a bill, which is chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, providing for new life-saving stations in different parts of the country.

Mr. RANDALL. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Not only in reference to this item, but in reference to all the items referring to this subject, the increase results in this part of the service from the legislation of last year.

Mr. RANDALL. It is only the increase directed by law?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Only the increase directed by law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For new life-saving stations on Long Island Sound, one at Eaton's Neck and one at Point Judith, $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that also in pursuance of law?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. All these increases in this branch of the service are.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one hundred and fifty keepers of stations, at $200 each, $30,000.

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. I see upon line 57 an appropriation for one hundred and fifty keepers of life-saving stations, at $200 a year each, while in the next paragraph there is an appropriation for five keepers at $2,400 each. I would like to inquire why the distinction is made and why the pay of these other keepers is increased?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The answer to that is that in the bill to which I have before referred, which was urged through Congress by the Committee on Commerce, section 3 provided that for this special service the keepers should have an additional compensation, on the whole not to exceed forty dollars a month. The Committee on Appropriations had no discretion in the matter; the salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is in pursuance of law?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Entirely so.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it advisable, to acquire, by donation or purchase, in behalf of the United States, the right to use and occupy sites for life-saving or life-boat stations and houses of refuge the establishment of which has been, or shall hereafter be, authorized by Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a new character of legislation so far as my experience goes; but I believe the rules of the House were suspended to allow it to come in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There are certain cases where the Secretary has offers of sites free and to the acceptance of which there is no objection except the letter of the law which does not permit him to receive them. The amendment speaks for itself, and needs no explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not strike out the word "purchase" and permit donations to be made? I do not like to give the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of the Government the right to purchase property without any restraint or limit.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is deemed advisable that sites of life-saving stations should be subject to the same rule as are the sites of light-houses, and while the Secretary is authorized to accept any gift where land is offered he should also, when Congress authorizes the construction of life-saving stations, be authorized to purchase sites, as he has in cases of light-houses.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that he be required to report to Congress annually his operations under this act.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no objection to that; but that is done every year in reference to the light-house sites. We have a report in reference to those sites in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury every year.

Mr. RANDALL. I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take this opportunity to say that it is impossible for him to determine whether the debate is exhausted or not, unless gentlemen will offer amendments. A gentleman before speaking should offer an amendment to the bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For fuel for thirty-eight vessels, repairs and outfits for same, ship-chandlery and engineers' stores for same, traveling expenses of officers traveling on duty under orders from the Treasury Department, commutation of quarters, and contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, and miscellaneous expenses which cannot be included under special heads, $260,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a suggestion to the gentleman in charge of this bill. The next two headings of the bill are "national currency" and "national loan." I suggest that the paragraphs under those two headings be passed over till we get through the bill, and I will state my reason for making the suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to speak upon the pending paragraph, and for the purpose of doing so I will move to strike out the last word. I desire to say, rather to those that shall come after me than to those that are here, something upon this subject. There ought to be a revision of the revenue-cutter service, of the light-house inspector service, of the engineer service, of the quartermaster service, and of the Navy. We have now, singular as it may seem, five navies, each running under a different flag. We have a regular Navy for one; we have this commercial navy for another; we have the light-house navy, to supply light-houses, for another; we have a quartermaster's navy in the Army for another; and we have the engineer navy on the sea-coast for another.

Now, all these ought to be consolidated. I once began to perfect a bill to do it, and tried to get the necessary information; but I ran against so many snags that I gave it up. I hope that somebody who will come after me will do it. Here is the trouble: the revenue-cutter service protects life and property and protects the revenue; that is one navy. There is another navy which I left out—the Coast Survey, which is engaged in surveying on the coast. The light-house steamers are engaged in supplying the light-houses.

All these different navies bear different flags. The smuggler in my country, when he sees a revenue-cutter flag, gets away as quick as he can in order to save himself. But when he sees the Coast-Survey flag or the light-house flag, he does not care anything at all about it; and if he sees the engineer flag or the Army flag up, he does not have any occasion to get out of their way, but runs right along under their noses. Now, if these navies were all consolidated, and the revenue-cutter service authorized to supply the light-houses when occasion requires, or the Coast-Survey to supply the light-houses or to protect the revenue, then there would be a saving of at least a quarter or a third, perhaps a half, by the consolidation. But it is too late this session to perfect such a measure, and I will leave it as a legacy to those who come after me to do what ought to have been done.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would it not be making that service a little too much of a jack-of-all-trades by putting it all in one?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They would not have any more to do than they have now.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are three under the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; three under the Treasury Department, two under the War Department, and one under the Navy Department; and all have ships afloat. I do not see why they should be under different heads, under different flags. That is all I have to say. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the suggestion I made a moment since, that we pass over till we get through the bill the paragraph under the headings "national currency" and "national loans." I will assign a reason why I make the suggestion.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a member, have had that subject under consideration during a large portion of the last session and during the present session. Different members of the committee have prepared reports, which are not yet accessible; that is, no portion of them accessible in the form of documents. There is a report signed by a portion of the members which has been placed upon our table, and which, I am told, the Superintendent of the Government Printing Office says was not printed there. I think it would be desirable that the whole subject should be before us in an intelligible form before we act upon these portions of this bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope we will act on the bill in its order.

Mr. MERRIAM. Does the gentleman believe that any man would read those reports if we had them?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that the report of the committee on behalf of the committee in relation to the bank-note company should come in here in accordance with the custom and usage of the House. The desire of the committee is that we shall have all the reports before us in the usual channel.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman mean to say that the committee did not authorize the report to which he refers? I do not know anything about it.

Mr. RANDALL. There were two reports from the Committee on Banking and Currency in reference to printing the currency. The one that Mr. PHELPS presented is the majority report and the one that Mr. MAYNARD presented lacks one of a majority, if you want to know that.

Now this morning there has been placed on our desks a printed copy of the report of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] while, notwithstanding the precaution that was taken to have the reports on both sides placed before us speedily, the official copies of those reports which should have come from the folding-room have been in some way kept back.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] asks unanimous consent that the paragraphs in relation to the national currency and national loan be postponed for future consideration.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nobody can lose any rights by this postponement, which, as I understand, is asked by the Committee on Banking and Currency, in order that their printed report may come in. It seems to me we ought to allow these matters to be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Clerk will omit to read the paragraphs in relation to the national currency and the national loan, and they will be reserved for consideration hereafter.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. A proposition for the reorganization of the Treasury was made in order as an amendment to this bill. I do not want to interfere with the rapid disposition of the bill; but I wish to bring in that amendment at some suitable place.

Mr. GARFIELD. It can come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Or perhaps at the end of this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIARY.

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; and also for jurors and witnesses and expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners; and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act of February 28, 1871, relative to the right of citizens to vote, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, $3,000,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I do this for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman who has charge of this bill whether any part of this appropriation is to be used as a secret-service fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. The secret-service fund is a separate appropriation under the head of the Treasury Department, and has nothing to do with this.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Has this Department a secret service connected with it?

Mr. GARFIELD. Out of its contingent fund the Department of Justice, as I understand, sometimes employs persons to obtain evidence. A small sum is used for that class of purposes under another head in a portion of the bill which we have not yet reached. No part of this judiciary fund is used as "a secret-service fund."

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I desire some information about this matter. Here is an appropriation of $3,000,000 in the aggregate, a part of which is for defraying the expenses of the courts of the United States, jurors, witnesses, safe-keeping of prisoners, "and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act of February 28, 1871, relative to the right of citizens to vote, or any acts amendatory or supplementary thereto."

I think there should be some discrimination made and some indication given in this bill as to the amounts which are to be applied to these different purposes respectively. We ought to know how much of this immense sum is to be spent under the direction of the Attorney-General to carry out the enforcement acts, by employing spies, detectives, and other infamous characters under the guise of United States marshals for the purpose of persecuting the downtrodden people of the South. I have no doubt much of it will be clandestinely used for such purposes.

I am satisfied that the secret-service force of the United States is being prostituted to the basest of purposes under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States. How much of this money can or will be used by him for this purpose I do not know; but the power is given to him to use as much of it as he pleases under pretense of carrying out the enforcement laws. That secret service is of course paid out of the Treasury in some manner, and this seems to be a convenient one. It was proved before the Committee on Ways and Means, when we had the Sanborn contracts before us, that not only was Sanborn himself in the secret service of the United States, drawing at least $3,700 out of the Treasury while acting under contracts for his own advantage, but he had a swarm of men paid by the Government working under and for him. Among others I recollect a man named A. Goodrich Fay (as the testimony taken before us showed) traveling all over Europe in his interest, who not only received from the Treasury over $3,000 in gold, but also turned over to the Treasury officials here "samples," as he called them, of silks and other goods valued at £150, which have never been heard from. Another man by the name of Martin was paid over $2,000 at the same time. These men were all working for their own private advantage. And in the celebrated safe-burglary case in this city, not long ago, it was shown that Nettleship and his gang of thieves were drawing money out of the Treasury just as they saw fit upon their own certificates, no account ever having been given to Congress either of the amount or of the object for which it was expended, so far as I have ever heard.

It has also been shown by testimony that the Attorney-General was employing men all over the South, squandering the money of the Government under the pretense of hunting Ku-Klux, but in reality oppressing the people for political purposes. We have a Committee on the Expenditures of the Treasury Department—one of our regular committees—a committee composed of five members with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SYPHER] as chairman.

Mr. SENER. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Does he contend that all these sums were paid out of any appropriation made for the Department of Justice?

Mr. BECK. They were paid in part at least out of this general sum, I presume.

Mr. SENER. No, sir; I will explain that.

Mr. BECK. I called on that committee, in a speech I made on this floor at the last session, for a full report as to what the secret-service bureau was doing and what it was costing, who were employed, and what amount of money was expended.

Mr. SENER. In our committee——

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. I am speaking of the committee of which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SYPHER] is chairman. I called upon them for a report last March. I was informed that they had not then had time to report. I am now told by the democratic member of that committee, the gentleman Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] that the committee has never met to this day, although he has called several times for a meeting. We are now within seven days of the close of this Congress, yet the committee charged to look into those matters has never reported and never met, so far at least as one member of the committee knows. I assert that there are hundreds of thousands of dollars squandered illegally and improperly in these aggregate appropriations in ways that Congress would not approve, but of which we cannot get any information. I am opposed to voting great sums of $3,000,000 in the aggregate unless we know something about their expenditure and retain some control over that expenditure. I do not know accurately how far the Department of Justice (so called) controls these people, but I know they are used by it in many improper ways.

I think I can safely assert that the Attorney-General of the United States, as shown in the western district of Arkansas, as shown in North Carolina, and in many other sections of the country, is paying men out of some fund for purposes he has no right to, and which Congress would not sanction if the facts were fully laid before it. For that reason I want the appropriations limited by law to specific purposes and the amounts to be applied to each definitely fixed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that that body insisted on its amendment to the concurrent resolution of the House to print seven thousand copies of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, with the accompanying engravings, agreed to the conference asked on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. SAULSBURY as managers of said conference on its part.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House to correct the enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 844) to authorize the promulgation of the general regulations for the government of the Army.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1082) granting to the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad the right of way through the public lands for a narrow-gauge railroad; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose no committee has discharged its duty more thoroughly than the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, which for the first time was created by the last session of this Congress. That there have been great frauds committed by the marshals of the United States cannot be denied. This judiciary fund goes to pay marshals for court expenses in fifty-one judicial districts in the United States and ten in the Territories. Payments out of it are made only upon accounts-current by the marshal, approved by the judge, and these accounts, after being thus approved by the judge of the district or circuit court, as the case may be, are afterward passed upon, first by the Auditor of the Treasury, and secondly and finally by the First Comptroller of the Treasury. We have examined as far as we could, holding meetings day by day, this whole question. We examined into that great fraud in the western district of Arkansas, where there were stolen, in my judgment, not less than from four to five hundred thousand dollars in the space of three years. The Attorney-General, in my judgment, was not responsible for these frauds. Within three years he changed the marshals three different times, and nearly every time the last marshal stole more than the one he displaced.

A MEMBER. By whom were they appointed?

Mr. SENER. The President appointed them on the recommendation, I suppose, of somebody who represented or professed to represent that State in Congress. But we investigated, as I was going on to say, into these expenditures and we found the opportunity for the frauds lay way back in the act of 1789. These frauds which have crept in upon the Governmennt have been caused, as I have said, by an old act of Congress which allowed the accounts of these marshals to be made up on accounts-current without being sworn to but merely certified to by the judges of the respective districts to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. In some particular districts the judges held it to be their duty under that law that they were not bound even to inquire into these expenditures; that if the services were performed the amounts appended and allowed were correct. The act which we reported here last session, and which, slightly modified by the Senate, has recently become a law, requires all these accounts of marshals, clerks, district attorneys, and commissioners now to be brought into open court and sworn to. It is further to be shown to the satisfaction of the court by oath of some party that the services were actually and necessarily performed; and even then that does not deprive the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the right to revise these accounts. This open door to fraud then has been closed.

Now, will this sum be too large? I doubt it; but it is apparent, Mr. Chairman, that with these precautions, unless there be collusion between the district attorney, the marshal, the clerk, and the judge, there can be no fraud on the Treasury.

In 1860 the appropriation for the judiciary fund was $1,000,000. Up to 1870, under the law, fines, forfeitures, and penalties went in aid of the judiciary fund, and there was an appropriation of so much money and of fines, forfeitures, and penalties; but in 1870 Congress cut off that feature of fines, forfeitures, and penalties, and made a specific appropriation, which for the last year was $3,000,000, and all of it will be needed, as a statement from the Acting Comptroller of the Treasury shows.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SENER. I hope I shall be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have no power to extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to oppose the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SYPHER.]

Mr. SYPHER. I would not have made any remarks on this subject but for the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and his drawing in my name in connection with the expenditures in the Department of Justice. I have nothing to do with the investigation of these; the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman had not. Therefore I did not look into that matter. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] and his committee examined the expenses of that Department quite thoroughly and submitted their report.

Mr. BECK. I spoke of the expenses of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SYPHER. I am coming to that. And I desire to remark that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is like a great many other useless things about this House. When we called our first meeting and attempted to go through the Department we found that the Committee on Appropriations was divided into subcommittees and had taken charge of every Bureau and branch of that Department. And not only that, but we found that the committee so ably presided over by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the Committee on Civil Service Reform, were also on a smelling expedition in that Department. We found the tracks of that committee wherever we went. And as these committees generally had the ear of the House, we thought the Treasury sufficiently guarded, without our traveling over the same ground which they had so well investigated. That perhaps is a sufficient explanation why the Committee on Expenditures has not done more in the way of investigation.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] to whom the gentleman from Kentucky referred, will bear me out in saying that the Committee on Expenditures was called several times at the beginning of the session and that we met and went through the Printing Bureau and examined quite thoroughly their books and ways of doing business; but when it appeared to us that other committees more privileged in this House than we were investigating this matter so thoroughly and perfectly, we did not deem it necessary, and the gentleman from Ohio will not say he ever applied to the chairman of the committee to have it convened, or that he had ascertained anything ought to be investigated which had been omitted by other committees of the House.

I think that is a sufficient defense for that committee. If there is anything in this appropriation of money which they are not entitled to, or if they have squandered that which has been given to the Department by former appropriations, I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] will find it out by means of his committee.

Mr. SOUTHARD and Mr. SENER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I only rise, Mr. Chairman, because my name has been introduced in this discussion in reference to the action of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. I do not understand the situation to be as it has been stated by the chairman of the committee.

At the beginning of the last session of Congress there was talk of calling a meeting of the committee, and three of the members took a bird's-eye view of the Treasury Department, and that was all the action that was ever had by the committee. I in person called upon the chairman of the committee at least three several times and requested him to convene the committee. The chairman stated that he would do so, and agreed to appoint the time and place for the meeting of the committee. At each of these times I appeared at the place designated, and no other member of the committee was there, not even the chairman himself. After these several failures I ceased any further efforts through the chairman to procure a meeting of the committee, and never to my knowledge was any meeting of that committee held during the last session or this session of Congress. I felt the importance of an examination, and I thought I did what I ought to do in order to have the committee convened.

Mr. WOOD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 153 and 154 strike out these words: "or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto."

Mr. WOOD. I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and if he can answer the interrogatories I wish to propound to him, I may possibly withdraw my amendment.

I desire to know, in the first place, the proportion of this appropriation which goes under the act of 1871. Then, secondly, I desire to know what the amendments to that act are which have made it necessary for the Treasury Department of this Government to expend any money. I desire, thirdly, to know whether it is designed that this appropriation shall cover any other acts amendatory to the act of 1871 that this Congress may pass before its final adjournment; whether this appropriation is to be retrospective in its operation, or whether it is designed thus to provide money for some purpose yet undeveloped on the part of this administration and the party in power.

I wait for a reply before I speak further on my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not hear some of the interrogatories of the gentleman from New York distinctly, but I shall reply to such as I heard. There cannot be a statement showing just the amounts of expenditures in that Department under this law or any particular law, because all the appropriations are for purposes authorized by law in the Department. No such division of expenses can be made.

Mr. WOOD. I think the gentleman from Ohio is not entirely candid in his answer to my question.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, yes; entirely so. The gentleman asked me how much it costs to enforce certain laws. I say it is impossible to answer that question, because the Department is bound to enforce all the laws, and they keep no separate account as to the cost of enforcing any particular law.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman entirely evades my question. It specifically applies to expenditures under a certain law, the law of February, 1871, with reference to the enforcement of the right of citizens to vote. It applies to the Southern States and to the Southern States exclusively. Now, I desire to know what portion of this $3,000,000 goes to the expenditures necessary for the enforcement of that law.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Attorney-General draws the money on the orders or at the request of the marshals. The marshal says, for instance, that he requires so much to pay jurors and for the enforcement of writs of the courts in his district, and the Secretary of the Treasury pays those expenses on the requisition of the Attorney-General; but there is nothing to show how much of the money is expended in the enforcement of the election laws, how much upon jurors, and it is not possible to make such a division.

Mr. WOOD. I understand the gentleman, then, to say that he cannot tell the House how much of this money is to be expended in the enforcement of the election law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nobody else can.

Mr. WOOD. I say that every monthly return from any marshal is on file in the office of the Attorney-General, and he knows exactly what proportion of this amount goes to certain States or to certain districts and for what purpose that money is drawn. Are we to accept the inference from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio that the marshals in the Southern States can draw upon the Government ad libitum to any extent and for any purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, not at all. Their accounts are sent through the regular officers to the Treasurer of the United States; and if the gentleman will turn to pages 32 and 33 of the report of the Attorney-General, he will see the returns from each judicial district and the amount expended in each district.

Mr. WOOD. Now, I desire an answer to my second question. I desire to know what are the acts which have been passed supplementary to the act of February 28, 1871, in the enforcement of which this fund is to be expended.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will turn to pages 32 and 33 of the report, he will see precisely where the expenses are, where the heavy expenses come in and where the light expenses come in.

Mr. WOOD. I will accept the reply so far as it goes; but I would inquire whether that statement refers to the additional acts as well as to the acts of February, 1871?

Mr. GARFIELD. They refer to those additional other acts, but not specifically.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to know whether it is designed that this appropriation shall cover the expense incurred under any act not yet passed by Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; nothing at all. I have gone carefully over the estimates of the expenses incurred under the existing acts of Congress, and there is no larger appropriation than is necessary to carry them out.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, having been one of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and having investigated this matter both last session and this, I think I am prepared to come to a just conclusion as to the amount asked for in the appropriation for the Department of Justice. And I might ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why it is that he proposes to increase the appropriation for this Department up to $3,000,000, when, according to the returns made by the Attorney-General for the last year, it was only $2,669,000. Why is it that this increase of appropriation is asked?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen to look at this very long list which I hold in my hand, showing by the report of the Attorney-General that there are some very extraordinary amounts exhibited. I might refer to this report, but there is no time to do it in five minutes. I ask gentlemen upon this floor to look at it for a moment. There is here an estimate for the extraordinary sum of $275,000 for special attorneys. Why is it that this large amount is to be expended upon special attorneys?

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon what page does the gentleman find that?

Mr. DURHAM. I find it on pages 32 and 33, the very pages to which the gentleman referred. As the gentleman from New York has stated, already we have district attorneys everywhere, and yet, according to the report of the Attorney-General, it is precisely as I have stated to you here.

Sir, while I concur in some things which have been stated by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] that perhaps some corrections have been made in this Department since our investigation commenced last year, I must say that I do not come to the conclusion that the gentleman from Virginia does, and that I believe that there is a great deal of room yet for the Attorney-General to make improvements in that Department. I repeat again, I do not see why it is that these extraordinary expenses have been had in this Department, as shown by the report which I hold in my hand. For instance, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, the Department of Justice expends here more than it expends for the whole State of Kentucky. You will find by looking at this report that the Department of Justice spends for the District of Columbia $129,000, while in the great State which I have the honor to represent in part here it expends only $68,000. In addition to that I call attention to the State of North Carolina, where there are two districts. In one of them there is exhibited in this report the extraordinary sum of $52,000 paid for marshals' fees and nothing but marshals' fees. For the whole district there was, as shown by this report, expended by the Department of Justice $137,000, whereas, as I said a moment ago, only $68,000 was expended in the whole of the great State which I in part represent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. WOOD, to strike out the words "or any acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto."

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. I renew the amendment. I do not think that any previous legislation of Congress contains words to this effect. It strikes me that this paragraph proposes to make an appropriation in advance for contemplated legislation. It says "for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act of February 28, 1871, relative to the right of citizens to vote, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto." That is evidently providing in advance an appropriation of Congress to carry out legislation which Congress has not yet enacted. I ask whether or not the legitimate construction of that language would not be that if this Congress should pass any act amendatory of or supplemental to the enforcement act before this appropriation went into effect next July it would be covered by this appropriation? I say that this language strikes me as unusual and extraordinary.

In my judgment this appropriation of $3,000,000 for the Department of Justice is at least half a million too high. I do not want to bring any railing accusations against the Attorney-General; but whether the responsibility be his or not, I say from my knowledge of that Department, derived from my investigation of its expenditures, that it is rotten from stem to stern. The President some days since sent a message to the Senate of the United States in relation to affairs in Arkansas. That message was accompanied by various documents which have been printed. One of them is a letter to the Attorney-General from D. F. McKibben, the president of the board of supervisors, Sebastian County. In that letter Mr. McKibben says:

> The utter failure of the United States grand jury, which has been in session at this place for the past four weeks, in bringing to light the frauds perpetrated in this district and exposing the guilty parties, is a matter of no little surprise to almost everybody except those directly interested. Facts have lately come into my possession which fasten the entire responsibility of this matter upon Marshal Fagan, who signed blank summonses to grand jurors, and directed the same to R. C. Kerns, Roots's old chief deputy, who filled in the names of such persons as he knew were friendly to him, and others upon whom suspicion of fraud rested, and thus the action of that grand jury was controlled completely by the men whom the Government was endeavoring to expose, and who kept up a constant communication with the members of the jury. One indictment was found, and in less than one hour thereafter the party was notified and left town. J. W. Donalley, chief clerk under Britton and Roots, although not to be seen in the marshal's office, makes up all the returns for deputies, and, in short, manipulates Fagan's accounts the same as under Britton and Roots. These are facts which can be substantiated, if necessary. A very large number of deputies have been commissioned, and among them some of the most disreputable characters that ever infested this country.

The way these frauds arise to a large extent is this: There are between seventeen and eighteen hundred United States commissioners all dependent for their fees on the amount of business that they do. They act in collusion with the deputy marshals, issue warrants on frivolous pretexts, sometimes issue them in blank and give them to the marshals, who go out and arrest parties and bring them before the commissioners, charging traveling for four or five or six hundred miles each, and then in many cases compromise with the parties, and charge the Government their fees. That is the way the frauds arise. It may not be the fault of the Attorney-General, but a great and infamous abuse is practiced with this judicial fund, and I say it is the duty of Congress to lay its strong arm upon it.

How shall we do it? Gentlemen may say that to decrease the amount to be appropriated will not be effective. I agree that it will not be entirely effective. But if we cut down the appropriations of the Attorney-General to $2,500,000, then when a marshal makes a requisition on him for so much money he will say to him that the general appropriation has been reduced and he cannot spare him as much as he asks for, but will only give him half as much. If he makes his requisition for $40,000, the Attorney-General may send him $20,000, for it is discretionary with him how much he will send. When these marshals know that the appropriation is reduced and that the power of the Attorney-General is limited in the premises, then they will reduce the number of their deputies, and the officers of the courts in the Southern States will be diminished, and the Government will save from half a million to a million dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say but a word. In this appropriation bill we have followed the exact language that has been followed in similar bills for many years. It is only this: that the appropriation we may authorize the Attorney-General to use shall be used for carrying out the laws that are in force, or that may be passed by Congress. We are appropriating for next year, and we use language that will authorize the Attorney-General to use this money for enforcing whatever may be the law next year. It is language we have always used, and, as I said to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] there is no additional appropriation and no additional estimates for anything expected to be done in the way of legislation. But we follow the exact language of the appropriation acts in all the years since I have known anything about them. There is nothing covered or concealed or intended to be.

Mr. WOOD. This is an exceedingly important question, because it involves the jurisdiction and control by an Executive Department over any appropriation made by Congress for any purpose. Now I want to understand the gentleman from Ohio very distinctly in the explanation he has just made. Suppose that between this time and the 4th of March next, this Congress should pass any act of any character whatever as an amendment to the act of February 28, 1871, (which is directly alluded to in the pending paragraph of this bill,) will the Attorney-General be justified in taking any portion of this appropriation to defray any expenditure under such an act?

Mr. GARFIELD. Why, sir, without the slightest possible doubt, if we pass an appropriation to carry on the courts of the United States and their various functions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, we make such appropriation in reference to all the laws that may be in force during that fiscal year. That is a matter of course.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has always been so; this is nothing new.

Mr. WOOD. I am not referring to the courts. We all know very well that the judges of our courts receive annual salaries provided for by law.

Mr. GARFIELD. This relates not merely to the salaries of the judges, but to the other expenses of the courts.

Mr. WOOD. We appropriate in pursuance of law for the salaries of judges. But here is a vague, indefinite contingent fund to be placed at the disposition of the Attorney-General, to be expended as he pleases and for any purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield further.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. How does the committee arrive at this sum of $3,000,000? Is it merely a lumped sum adopted in order to reach an amount large enough for the Attorney-General to draw upon to meet the expenses of these courts?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will tell the gentleman. When the Committee on Appropriations first took up this question since I have been a member of the committee, we found that from three-quarters of a million to a million dollars was received as fines, penalties, forfeitures, and the like, and was never covered into the Treasury, but was used directly to meet the expenses of the Judicial Department. We found that such had been the practice from the beginning of the Government. But the Committee on Appropriatians determined to stop that practice—to cover all that class of receipts into the Treasury and to make an aggregate appropriation for all the expenses of the Judicial Department. In doing this we went over a series of years and found what the actual expenses had been. We then made an estimate deliberately on the basis of past experience. We have done the same in this case. We propose to appropriate this year considerably less than was appropriated last year; for, although this particular item is the same, other items are less.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and of the House to some facts in connection with this matter. I find that the expenditures under this head for the year ending June 30, 1874, were $2,669,730.81. The proposition is now to make this appropriation $3,000,000.

Mr. SENER. May I make an explanation?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I prefer that the gentleman should wait a moment.

Mr. SENER. An explanation may help the gentleman. The Attorney-General allows so much money periodically, as it may be needed by the marshals, upon requisitions; and he then certifies how much he has allowed upon such requisitions. Now, the Comptroller of the Treasury can certify absolutely how much has been paid out during any one year; and in a telegram which I have here the Comptroller states that the whole of this fund for 1874 has been paid out upon vouchers finally passed through his office, except $47,759, which he thinks will be required to close pending accounts.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Yes, sir. Now I want to call attention to a fact which I believe was alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] though I could not hear him say distinctly. Among these expenditures you will find, for example, in the western district of Arkansas, the enormous amount of $80,785 paid out to marshals upon these requisitions of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] speaks. I find also that in the State of North Carolina there was paid to the marshals alone $142,733.

Mr. SENER. That is for two districts.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Now, if you turn to the District of Columbia you will find that there was paid to the marshal alone in this District $82,947; about twice as much as is paid to the marshals of both the districts of the great State of Ohio. Now, I think it is time to look into this matter; and for one I insist that we should cut down this appropriation at least $500,000.

Mr. ARCHER obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. SENER.

Mr. SENER. In explanation of the matters referred to by my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] and my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] let me say that in the courts of Ohio and in those of North Carolina you have only the ordinary United States jurisdiction; while in the District of Columbia there are five judges holding courts all the year round, including a general term, an equity court, a criminal term, and a probate term, besides a police justice's court. There is also a district court of the United States.

There was a very large expenditure, I grant, for the district attorney for this district. You have a large amount paid the district attorney, as shown by the Attorney-General's report; but that is under an express provision of a law passed by Congress, which does not allow the accounting officers of the Treasury to revise his accounts. It is a law which was passed in 1870. He was paid last year for services for himself and for deputies and for all sorts of contingent expenses, including about $1,000 for stationery, $24,000. That was by a law passed by Congress. You have given the district attorney of the southern district of New York a carte blanche, and he spends $30,000 a year, himself and deputies. You have since 1860, when this fund was a million dollars, created twelve more courts in the United States by the erection, in my opinion, of useless judicial districts. The increase for that purpose is $400,000. You have authorized the Attorney-General to employ special counsel in certain cases. You have made it obligatory upon him, whenever called upon by the head of any Department who thinks the interests of the Government require it, to employ counsel in special cases. And these special attorneys authorized by law and requested by the several heads of Departments amount to $150,000 more. You have since 1860, when this fund was $1,000,000, added a system of internal-revenue laws. You have also cases under the pension law which have been largely increased by the war, out of which there necessarily springs much civil and criminal business. There are also cases arising out of the bounty laws and out of frauds incident to bankruptcy proceedings. There are also cases growing out of the national banking act. In the State of New York alone, for the election in 1872, $100,000, as I have the statement here to show, was paid for supervisors and deputy marshals under your election laws.

The Attorney-General has no option over these expenses. His Department is given a certain sum, and whether correctly expended or not is for the courts and the accounting officers of the Treasury to say. I have not found in my examination that this Attorney-General has been so smeared as some gentlemen seem to think. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is the only committee of these committees on expenditures which for many years has marched squarely up to its duty and investigated these expenditures, and I wish to say we have not found that Department guilty of the wrong-doing which has been attributed to it in vague and indefinite charges.

Mr. DEWITT. I wish to know whether there are any acts amendatory of the acts of February 28, 1871?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know.

Mr. DEWITT. If there are not, then there is no necessity for reference to them.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to make it $2,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say once more that this is an extremely loose way of making appropriations. In making appropriations we take care very often to particularize in items even as low as a few hundred dollars, so much for pens, so much for ink, so much for laborers, so much for this, and so much for that, pretending at least to be appropriating specifically and carefully. Here is the sum of $3,000,000 in the aggregate the control of which, so far as this House is concerned, goes into the hands of the Attorney-General, as the head of the Department of Justice, to be used by him for any purpose he may construe to be necessary to carry out the enforcement laws and acts supplementary thereto.

If gentlemen wish to know how that money is spent, under pretense of executing these odious laws, let them turn to the special report of the committee of the two Houses, composed of seven Senators and fourteen Representatives, where the proof is abundant in the case of North Carolina, where there is now so much trouble to ascertain how so much money is spent. In that report it was shown by abundant testimony that marshals were appointed all over the country for whom there was no use, and men would come to their offices to be arrested and get a portion of the fees for the arrest. As prompt dismissal of proceedings followed in these bogus cases, it was a convenient way of purchasing political allegiance. It was shown that thousands and thousands of dollars were squandered for the arrest of men without any cause and without any charge made against them, for no other reason in the world except to get the money out of the Treasury of the United States. That testimony is now in the document-room, and shows fully and conclusively the truth of what I have stated.

I have said that I do not want the Attorney-General to have that unlimited power, because I have no faith in him; and if I had no other reason to not have faith in him, I find reason for it in his own official register of the employés of his Department. There, sir, has been a scandal the most disgraceful that ever befell this country. In the safe-burglary business, where an honest, innocent man was sought to be deprived of his liberty and reputation by such a conspiracy as perhaps no other country ever witnessed before, I find the Attorney-General of the United States appointing the man whose safe was robbed, the man who was more than suspected of being implicated in the conspiracy, assistant district attorney for this District on the 24th of April, 1874. Now, that safe was broken open late on the night of April 23, 1874, or early on the morning of the 24th. Mr. Harrington won his spurs on that morning. Then he was found to be fit to be the assistant district attorney of the United States, although he swore ten days prior to that date, before a committee of this House, that he was not an officer of the Government, and therefore could be an officer of the District of Columbia. What had he done on that eventful night? Was it important that he should have official control over the grand juries, witnesses, and prisoners in this District? The Attorney-General doubtless had some reason satisfactory to himself for intrusting him with this authority; at least his records show that the moment he became implicated in this safe robbery he is commissioned by the Attorney-General of the United States an officer of this Government at a salary of $2,500 a year, and the official records show the fact.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. How many men who served upon the jury that were unable to agree have been provided with places since that?

Mr. BECK. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I do not suppose that any thought I may have or any suggestion I may venture to make in respect to the item now under consideration will have more effect than an attempt of a canary bird to break the back of a rhinoceros. But, sir, that consciousness shall not prevent my going upon the record, and, if you please, as a prophet. I know the fate of prophets, but I tell the gentlemen on this side of the House that the time is coming when obnoxious monthly tariff bills cannot be passed here to cover blind appropriations of this character.

Here is a proposition in eight or ten lines to vote $3,000,000 in a lump. I appeal to the common sense of the House whether it can be justified or much longer tolerated? There is no commercial establishment in the world which, pursuing such a policy, could avoid bankruptcy. Neither can the Government of the United States live, except as a dishonored bankrupt, if it persists in such a policy.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this House should not be called upon in these pinching times to place three millions of money at the disposal of any man, nor should it in any way dispose of round sums so that its members cannot go to the country and vindicate their votes now and hereafter. When money came rolling in by hundreds of millions you could dispense it in that way with impunity, but not so now.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says, in vindication of this proposition, that it is the old way for many years. Ay, sir. It is the old rut. And it is the old rut that is leading the Government to bankruptcy. But, sir, you will have to get out of that rut if the people of this country are intelligent and this is to remain a republican Government.

I say, Mr. Chairman—and if I speak earnestly it is because I know I am speaking the truth—that large commercial establishments in the country that mean to prosper are forced to cut down expenses nearly or quite one-third; and the time is near at hand when Congress will have to come to that or something near it. Your employés will have to work more than six hours a day and must be well paid for what they do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine, obtained the floor, and said: I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] had a speech prepared in the last war with Great Britain, and therefore I yield my time to him.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I accept the gentleman's time, and will reply to his impertinence in a speech prompted by his own official conduct.

On Friday morning I went to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, thirty hours before the final disposition of the tariff bill, and asked him to recognize me to give some facts showing the absurdity of the fifth section of the bill. He did not promise to do it. The next morning, when the points I wished to touch upon had been alluded to, I went to the desk and said "Will you recognize me?" He said "I cannot." What was the result? There were fifteen speeches here from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] getting in by the courtesy of a Pennsylvania member of the Committee on Ways and Means, succeeded in making one speech from New York, besides Mr. ROBERTS, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, allowed Pennsylvania to speak fifteen or sixteen times, while New York was allowed to speak but twice.

Well, now, I do not complain of that. If the gentleman's character for fair dealing and the republican party, of which he is a distinguished member, can stand that sort of judicial fairness, I can stand it; but it will not be so forever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the amendment and on the amendment to the amendment. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I withdraw it that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] may renew it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I am not well enough to do justice to this subject to-day, but I hear so much said about the State of North Carolina that I feel it is due to her that some of her Representatives should be heard on this question, and unwell as I am I must address a few words to the committee.

I see no occasion, Mr. Chairman, for increasing this appropriation, as it is proposed to increase it, by several hundred thousand dollars, when the country ought to be and is becoming more peaceable and law-abiding instead of getting worse. The trouble, Mr. Chairman, about this business all lies in a nutshell. While the Government is being run upon the pretense of preventing the intimidation of voters, it is engaged itself in intimidating all the democratic voters in the South for party purposes.

That is what you run your courts for; that is what you pass your laws for; that is what you propose to suspend the writ of habeas corpus for, and threaten to destroy the very liberties of the whole country in order to intimidate millions of white men and drive them from the polls, so that you can hold on to power. Sir, you ought to be ashamed of yourselves when you hold us up to censure because, as you state, we have intimidated a few negroes, while you are endeavoring to intimidate millions of white men. That is what is the matter.

In North Carolina, Mr. Chairman, the marshals have had more than $50,000 paid to them, and I do not know how much more has been expended, but I believe several hundred thousand dollars in one of the North Carolina districts.

Mr. SPEER. One hundred and forty thousand dollars.

Mr. ROBBINS. This is in one-half of the State, when in the whole State of Kentucky the Government only paid $68,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is all wrong to put this round sum of $3,000,000 into the hands of a man like the Attorney-General of the United States, a man who works for his party and forgets his country; who seems willing to enslave and destroy States in order that he may hold on to place and aid those to do so to whom he truckles.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have discovered in the last ten minutes that the country and the republican party are in immit nent danger from two sources, the one just indicated by the gentleman who has taken his seat in the intimidation that we propose to carry out as a party upon ten millions of better people. Upon that point I say nothing. It is a large subject, which in five minutes no one can argue. But this further danger is discovered, that the republican party is to be dissolved because the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] whenever he seeks the floor to talk upon one subject or another, fails to get it. Now, there have been some things undoubtedly that have troubled the republican party. There have been too large expenditures in certain Departments; there may have been maladministration in the South; I have sometimes felt myself as if there was. There may have been faults in the construction of our tariff bills and in the enforcement of the revenue laws; but it never dawned on me before what was the tremendous nature of the frowning danger impending over us until the gentleman turned and asked if the republican party can stand it that he did not get in a five-minute speech on the tariff bill!

The gentleman from New York when he first broke ground here took a pledge of total abstinence from speaking until after the holidays. He took that pledge and kept it only for a little while, having been very lively on his feet since the holidays. If when I was in the chair yesterday I was instrumental in breaking down the republican party by keeping the gentleman down and bringing it to the ruin that he predicts and turning over the Government to our friends on the other side of the House; with that crime resting on me—for which he has arraigned me—I ask the forgiveness of my fellow-members of the republican party; and I hope that gentlemen on the opposite side, for the good I have done them in raising this great issue of the gentleman's repression which I charge it upon them to keep foremost in the next presidential campaign, will award me a fair meed of praise, and as I know that they are good fellows, they will do it. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 101, noes 45.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate on the paragraphs in relation to the Judiciary Department be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. SPEER. O, I hope not; I hope the gentleman will make it twenty minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to limit the debate only upon the pending paragraph.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio so as to make the time allowed for debate twenty minutes instead of ten, and I think that is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will compromise on fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPEER. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the House to close debate on more than one paragraph of the bill at a time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have modified my motion so as to close debate in fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPEER. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The question was taken on the motion to close debate, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole; and being taken, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] to strike out $3,000,000 and insert $2,000,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COOK. I renew the amendment. In connection with this paragraph making appropriations for the carrying out of the enforcement acts, I desire to read from the report of the Attorney-General to show the number of prosecutions under those arts, and the disposition made of them. As they relate exclusively to the South, I ask the earnest attention at least of gentlemen on this side of the House to a statement.

The Attorney-General reports, on page 6 of his annual report, that there were nine hundred and sixty-six arrests under the enforcement acts. In regard to the disposition of those cases he says there were one hundred and two convictions, ninety-two acquittals, and seven hundred and seventy-two discontinuances. Now, about those seven hundred and seventy-two discontinuances: Were they properly discontinued? The parties were arrested and transferred sometimes several hundred miles in order to be brought before the courts.

Mr. DAWES. Do you object to the discontinuances?

Mr. COOK. Not at all; but I object to appropriating $3,000,000 improperly, that is what I object to. There were one hundred and two convictions in thirteen States. Yet gentlemen are arraying themselves against the people of the States of the South, denouncing them as bandits and outlaws, and guilty of every offense against this Government. Yet here it would seem there were seven hundred and seventy-two improper and illegal arrests, for I take it for granted that no judge or district attorney or Attorney-General would discontinue a case that was founded on such evidence as to justify conviction. I object to appropriating $3,000,000 for the arrest of innocent men, as shown by the seven hundred and seventy-two discontinuances.

Look at my State, the State of Georgia. There was expended, as shown by this report, $76,595 in that State to the marshal. There were thirty-four arrests and prosecutions under the enforcement act, of which there were six convicted and all the rest acquitted. Here were expenditures of $76,000 to carry out the enforcement acts and procure the conviction of six men. What does all this argue? It shows that the charges of outrage on the part of the southern people, and violation of the enforcement acts of Congress which have been passed from year to year, are mere whims, mere pretexts, and utterly false, founded upon the most frivolous charges which cannot be sustained before the courts. They are cases which when they come before the court, before the judges upon the bench, are not sustained. The judge in my State is a republican out and out; so is the district attorney, and so are the marshals. But they are respectable men and administer the laws in good faith. And yet out of thirty-four arrests in the State of Georgia for the violation of these enforcement acts there were but six convictions, and in the whole South there were but one hundred and two convictions for violations of the enforcement acts.

Mr. MCKEE. Then it was not such a terrible thing after all; not so terribly oppressing.

Mr. COOK. No; but the cost of it is oppressive. It shows this, that upon the most frivolous pretexts men are arrested. Any little difference between the people of different color, and sometimes of the same color, gives ground for charges which lead to these arrests, and the party arrested is obliged to travel from one hundred to three hundred miles in my State to get to a Federal court, and to give bonds for his appearance there, and when he gets there there is no evidence to convict him. When the prosecuting officers come to look into these cases they see that their charges are outrageous and inconsistent, and hence you have had these seven hundred and seventy-six discontinuances.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to oppose this amendment, for although it is a reduction of $1,000,000, and for that reason will receive my vote, yet I do not believe the proposed reduction is sufficient. I ask every lawyer on this floor who has been engaged in the practice of his profession for a year, or for fifty years, to state to his constituents and to answer to himself this question: here is an appropriation asked for of $3,000,000, not for the payment of the salaries of the judges, but simply for the expenses of the courts. The Attorney-General in his letter to the chairman of the committee sums up that there are held during the year four hundred and eighty-two terms of the United States courts, which at $3,000,000 per year, would give us an average sum of $6,223 to the term. Now I ask every lawyer upon this floor if he does not know that that was an unwarrantable expenditure of the people's money—over $6,000 to a term of the courts? Go to your own State courts, does it cost one tithe of $6,000 to hold a term of your State courts? Many of the terms of these courts do not last over one week. In my own State very often a term of the United States court does not last over one or two weeks. In many of the other States the term does not last over a week. Yet here is an average of $6,200 for every term of court that is held.

Mr. MCKEE. Does not the gentleman know that it must necessarily be more expensive to summon witnesses and jurors before United States courts (there being perhaps but one or two of such courts for a whole State) than it is to summon witnesses and jurors before the local courts of a State?

Mr. HEREFORD. I know it is a fact (and every lawyer I presume who has practiced in the United States courts knows it) that sometimes when men have gone one hundred miles from their homes to the place where the United States court is held for the purpose of attending to their own business as newspaper editors perhaps, or possibly as lawyers, they have been summoned by the United States marshal to serve as jurors, and he has then certified to mileage as if those men had been summoned at their own homes; the mileage has been charged from their residences to the place where the court was held and back again.

Mr. McKEE. That may be so in West Virginia; but it is not so in Mississippi.

Mr. HEREFORD. Furthermore, I see by the report of the Attorney-General that there has been expended in one district in North Carolina $142,000 as court expenses, when for the whole State of Pennsylvania a less amount was paid for such expenses. Does any gentleman who hears me believe that this is an honest expenditure—that more money has honestly been expended for court expenses in one district in North Carolina than in the whole State of Pennsylvania? I appeal to honored Representatives of Pennsylvania on this floor and ask them whether they believe this is an honest expenditure for court expenses? Every one must see that it is not. I therefore ask that this bill be cut down.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to say, in concluding this debate, that the annual assault made upon the judiciary of the United States and the administration of justice under it is something that has very greatly surprised me every time these bills have been before us. During the last year, as shown by a letter of the Attorney-General addressed to myself, there were four hundred and eighty-two terms of United States courts; there were before those courts nineteen thousand one hundred and ninety-four civil suits and six thousand six hundred and twenty-seven criminal suits. The administration of our judicial system, including the enforcement of our revenue laws, complicated as they are in their numerous details, costs, I venture to say, less in proportion to the extent of territory, the number of the courts, and the multiplicity of cases than any judicial establishment of any State of this Union.

The following is the letter of the Attorney-General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 4, 1875.

SIR: Referring to our conversation this morning, I now have the honor to inform you that, under existing laws, there are four hundred and eighty-two terms of United States courts held during the year, and one hundred and thirty-eight places designated wherein they shall be held. This does not include special terms. I am unable to state definitely the number of special terms held within any given year, but I think I am safe in saying that there is not less than fifty. This will give you some idea of the vast amount of business transacted in the Federal courts throughout the country.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] who has given this subject some special examination.

Mr. SPEER. It was on my motion that fifteen minutes were assigned to this debate, and I ask the Chairman whether he intends to rule me out from occupying any portion of that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the right to yield the balance of his time to whomever he pleases.

Mr. SPEER. As it was on my motion that this time was allowed for debate in Committee of the Whole, I think it unfair on the part of the Chair that I should be denied any part of that time.

Mr. DURHAM. I should like to put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not now the floor.

Mr. SENER. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] I wish to say that I prepared in part and submitted the report upon the affairs in the western district of Arkansas; and hence I am able to affirm that all the frauds there were perpetrated with the knowledge and consent of a corrupt judge, Story, not by the Attorney-General.

I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] that since the creation of that western district of North Carolina the internal-revenue receipts on tobacco alone have increased, according to a statement which I have from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, nearly $200,000 in one year; and licensed distilleries have increased to such an extent that while during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, there were twenty-three distilleries, with a capacity of eight hundred and thirty gallons daily, there were during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, eighty-four distilleries, with a daily capacity of nearly twenty-one hundred gallons.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. SENER. I cannot yield. Thus it will be seen upon an inspection of affairs in that district, such as has been given by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, that there has been an unusual amount of crime there—evasion of the revenue laws, counterfeiting, &c. Persons employed in the secret service have had to go there and remain weeks at a time in order to detect these evasions and violations of the law. Though these expenditures may appear large, they are certified to by the judge and approved by the auditor and comptroller; and the integrity of the present judge, so far as I know, has not been impeached here or elsewhere. This statement is due to the marshal of the district, as well as to the Attorney-General, who has nothing to do with these expenditures. They come before the judiciary for approval. This whole fund of $3,000,000, if expended, will have to be expended according to law, under the supervision of the judiciary; and any reflections in advance as to these disbursements affect not the Attorney-General but the judiciary of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by order of the House for debate upon this paragraph is exhausted. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] to make the appropriation $2,000,000 instead of $3,000,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move an amendment to make the appropriation $2,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments now pending.

The amendment of Mr. COOK was not agreed to; there being ayes 49, noes not counted.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend by striking out $3,000,000 and inserting $2,500,000.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 60, noes 92.

Mr. SPEER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 101.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I now move to amend after the word "thereto," in line 154, by the insertion of the words "now in force," so that it will read, "and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act of February 28, 1871, relative to the right of citizens to vote, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, now in force, $3,000,000;" thus making it apply to existing laws only.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 87.

Mr. WOOD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOOD and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and maintenance of convicts transferred from the District of Columbia, $8,000.

Mr. SPEER. I move to strike that out.

I sought the floor a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, when the appropriation of $3,000,000 for the Department of Justice was up, in order to show wherein I thought it was excessive and why it should be reduced. There are sixty-four marshals in the United States, and by law their salaries, made up of fees, mileage, &c., cannot exceed $6,000 per annum. Sixty-four marshals at $6,000, the maximum of salary which they can receive, would make $384,000, which by law is all they are entitled to.

Now, what have they received by the report of the Attorney-General? There have been paid to marshals the enormous sum of $2,071,332.18. Or, in other words, there have been paid to marshals and their deputies $1,687,332 more than their legal salaries. How is that accounted for? It is done in this way: These marshals evade the law by employing a host of deputies and paying them constructive mileage upon cases which they go out to the country and hunt up, and when they are brought to trial, if they ever are brought to trial, nine-tenths of them are non-prossed and no conviction takes place.

For the amount of appropriation there is no Department of the Government where there is so much corruption, and I must express my surprise at the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice rising on this floor and admitting that in the western district of Arkansas there were $500,000 stolen and yet voting for an appropriation of $300,000 over what was expended last year, and more than was expended during the year when he says half a million was stolen. Does he want that stealing to go on? Why does he in his zeal for the Attorney-General, who is responsible indirectly if not directly for these expenditures and frauds—why does he vote $300,000 more than was expended last year and more than was expended each year when this stealing of half a million was going on?

The chairman of the committee has undertaken to ride two horses at the same time, which no circus-rider ever did successfully when the horses were going in opposite directions. He is attempting to go for reform and at the same time to justify the Attorney General, when the Attorney-General and reform are not traveling in the same line. Therefore he has attempted to do what I say no circus-rider ever successfully accomplished.

I do not wish to do the Attorney-General an injustice, but I wish to protect the Treasury, to protect the expenditure of the public funds; and wherever a public officer, by direction or indirection, by carelessness or actual participation, has failed in his public duty, it is my duty and the duty of the gentleman from Virginia to rise in his place and say so, let the consequences be to him as a member of the republican party what they may. His duty to the Treasury, his duty to the country, is above his friendship and personal relations to the Attorney-General.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SENER. In response to my very earnest and eloquent friend, between whom and myself personally there can be nothing but good feeling, I wish to say that if he had given as much attention to this question as he has to partisanship upon this floor, he would know these marshals' disbursements include not only their fees and the fees of their deputies, but the marshals, nearly seventy in the United States, are the disbursing officers for all these courts; that they pay mileage to witnesses; that they pay the attendance of witnesses; the arrest, transportation, and keeping of prisoners; that they pay the incidental expenses of the court; and that these $2,400,000 are for these purposes.

Sir, I do not justify the frauds in the western district of Arkansas. I put the seal of my condemnation upon them; but do not let us from eagerness to do justice do injustice. The frauds in that district were brought to the attention of the House and the country by Mr. Whitney, a detective sent there by order of George H. Williams, Attorney-General of the United States. When we called upon the gentleman upon this floor [Mr. HYNES] who offered the resolution to investigate that district, he could give us no information. We brought witness after witness before us, but nothing could be ascertained. Then we laid our hands on this detective who went there by order of the Attorney-General. He brought to light these frauds and enabled us to bring the parties to justice, and succeeded in getting rid of that corrupt judge, Story.

Mr. SPEER. Had the Attorney-General ever done anything to correct those abuses.

Mr. SENER. Yes. He had sent this officer there three times, and had turned out in three years three marshals.

Now I want to say this: that if any part of this fund is misappropriated, it is the fault of the disbursing officers of the Treasury and of the judges. And if they are all corrupt, if we have reached that condition that you cannot trust the Treasury, then indeed it is a dark day for the Republic.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He has spoken about the Attorney-General sending a detective to the western district of Arkansas. I ask him whether the Representatives of that State did not call the attention of the House to these extraordinary expenses before the Attorney-General ever took any step in the matter?

Mr. SENER. The record will show that the detective was sent first.

Mr. HYNES. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield me the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. SENER. I yield it to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. HYNES.]

Mr. HYNES. I want to state, in regard to the investigation about the expenses in the western district of Arkansas, having moved for the inquiry in the House as to the character and direction of those expenses, my attention having been called to the matter at the time by certain newspaper articles, I moved the inquiry; and although what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] states is correct as a matter of record, that the inquiry was moved by myself as a Representative from the State of Arkansas, I consulted the Attorney-General before offering that resolution, and he encouraged and approved it.

Mr. DURHAM. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Did the Attorney-General call the attention of the House to the fact in his report?

Mr. HYNES. I do not remember. He had all necessary corrective in the courts, and had already instituted inquiry by detectives.

Mr. DURHAM. That is where the gentleman from Virginia is mistaken.

Mr. SENER. Not only did he send a special agent there, but he has recently sent one to Mississippi also, and turned out a corrupt marshal there.

The question being put on Mr. SPEER'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 162 strike out "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$80,000," and add as follows: "Fifty thousand dollars of which may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in procuring evidence for the defeat of fraudulent claims against the United States: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid for any evidence or document to be used as evidence, unless the claim shall be finally defeated because of the evidence so procured, to which fact the Attorney-General shall certify."

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No point of order will lie to it. It only limits the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. The fact that it is a limitation does not meet the point of order that it changes existing law. It is true that a limitation is always in order, but it cannot be allowed if that limitation changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not at all; it only says what shall be done with a certain appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] state what is his point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think everybody will agree that this ought to be done, if I am allowed to explain my amendment. This is the ground upon which I offer it, and I pray the attention of the committee, if I can have it. There are large claims, one of $900,000 and one of almost $800,000, where there is evidence in the possession of outside men that will go to control and defeat those claims; and there is no power now for the Attorney-General to do anything to get their evidence. A man comes and says, "Here I have a voucher which will defeat a very large claim of $900,000; but it is my property and not the property of the Government; I will not let it go unless I am paid." And there is another case which has been brought to the attention of the Judiciary Committee, where a man has a book containing estimates made at the time by a board of survey as to damages for the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he says, "This book I have got in my possession, and I won't give it up unless I can be paid; and I do not want any pay unless this book, this evidence, will defeat the claim."

Now, then, I have offered this provision to allow the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, where claims are fraudulently brought against the United States, to have money by which they can defend the United States. In order that there may be no wrong done, my amendment provides that not a dollar shall be paid until the Attorney-General certifies that the evidence so procured and agreed to be paid for was the evidence on which the claim was defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the point of order and not upon the merits of the bill. The point of order is raised that this money was to be expended in a certain manner and the amendment proposes a different expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no provision of law by which it shall be expended. There is a provision of $30,000 now, and I have raised it to $50,000 and limited the expenditure in a given way. If the House chooses to give the increased amount, they have a right to determine how it shall be expended. There is no law which requires that expenditure; there is no law which governs that expenditure. It is put into the hands of such officers as Congress chooses to put it into.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, from the examination he has been able to give to the subject, thinks that it does change existing law by transferring this fund from the hands of the officers now having charge of it under the law, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will modify my amendment by striking out the words "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. CESSNA. I ask that the amendment, as modified, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "thirty," in line 162, and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty," and add "and of that appropriation $50,000 may be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General in procuring evidence for the defeat of fraudulent claims against the United States: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid for any evidence, or documents to be used as evidence, unless the claim shall be finally defeated because of the evidence so produced, to which fact the Attorney-General shall finally certify.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that amendment will pass for the sake of public justice.

Mr. POTTER. The amendment proposes to give authority for an expenditure of money which the law does not now allow; and therefore it necessarily changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment as modified comes within the rules, and is in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe that on the whole we have appropriated a sufficient amount of money for the purposes of the Judiciary Department, not too much but enough, and that we ought not to authorize an increase, and an increase for a purpose which seems to be peculiar in its character. The object of the amendment is to enable the Attorney-General to procure evidence in a certain class of claims. It does not say by what means. If brought before the courts of course they will have them examined, and if before the Departments it seems to me that we do not need any figuring. It seems to me also as if this money may be used in some peculiar manner to defeat claims against the Government. It is an unnecessary amount of appropriation and an unusual demand to add this to the expenditures for this Department.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I offer the following amendment in lieu of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in defending or defraying the expenses of or connected with claims for cotton seized by the agents of the Treasury Department after the 13th day of June, 1865, and the proceeds of which cotton were directed by the fifth section of the act of May, 1872, to be by the Secretary of the Treasury paid over to the owners thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Do I understand that the Chair rules the amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment proposed is entirely new legislation, and therefore he rules it out of order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then I desire to occupy the floor in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts has already been spoken to for and against.

Mr. POTTER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I am utterly opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] It was before the Committee on the Judiciary in the form of a separate bill and it now comes in here as an amendment to an appropriation bill. The object is to put a fund in the hands of the Attorney-General by which he can buy the evidence of any person who will not tell what the Attorney-General thinks the interests of the United States require that he should tell.

In my judgment such a law is upon principle erroneous and demoralizing. It is subject also to the further objection that it is open to the gravest abuses on the part of the officer who has the fund in charge. Wherever the Government has gone into this business of informers the results have been such, so far as this country was concerned, as to make the people dissatisfied with such methods of getting evidence. There are processes of law by which a man can be compelled to come forward and testify, and if he venture to commit perjury the law has provided for his punishment. The experience of centuries has shown that, on the whole, this was the best method to get at truth and that which is bought is rarely to be relied upon.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. How would the gentleman get along with a case of this kind? Suppose that a party has in his possession a book that is of very great importance to the Government as evidence. That party deposits that book over in Canada, and he is called as a witness in a case here in Washington. I would like to know by what process or operation the Government can compel the production of that book?

Mr. POTTER. By the ordinary processes of law, by means of which any man may recover any such book in Canada. There are courts in Canada which furnish to persons competent to bring suits in them competent legal remedies for such a case.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Suppose that when you have got your writ over in Canada the party transfers the book back into the State of New York.

Mr. POTTER. Then follow it into the State of New York, where you have courts that will give you your remedy.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Suppose that the case is already going on, in the trial of which the book is needed, as was the case recently in Washington; what then?

Mr. POTTER. That depends upon whether you can get your trial put off or not. It probably would be cheaper in some cases to buy a man than to fight him. But it is a dangerous principle to apply in legislation, and it is a discretion which never should be given to any officer of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. I propose to modify my amendment so that it shall apply only to prosecutions in the courts of the United States. I do that to meet the point of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] as it is all that was intended.

Now, I want to state just this one case here, and then you can see what you are doing. An Englishman has obtained a judgment in the Court of Claims for $900,000. That judgment, on the face of the evidence, is as good as any judgment that can be taken, and it is on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States, and you cannot touch it as it stands now. Now, I have seen a copy of a letter from that Englishman in the hands of a man who says that the letter is genuine. The letter says that the cotton for which this judgment was obtained was bought by him in exchange for arms which he ran through the blockade. Now, if that fact could be proved, the claimant could not get a dollar, and the United States would save $900,000. The man says, as he has a right to say, that that letter is his private property, and you cannot force it out of him.

Mr. POTTER. Why not?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will tell you why; I can answer that question. If you undertake to force it from him, in the first place, he may say that he will put it in the stove. And where are you then?

Mr. POTTER. Call you to prove the copy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; but how can you prove the original? More than that; there is other evidence in England to be sent for; and how are you to get it there? That is a matter of comity only. There are half a dozen like cases within the knowledge of the Department of Justice, where this evidence is lying about, and you cannot get it. If you undertake to force its production, you will not get it; you may destroy it, but you cannot get it. I say you must have confidence in your officers. If you have not an Attorney-General who is fit to carry on the business of his office, then impeach him, and not continually blackguard him as you are doing. During the whole of this term I have heard nothing but complaints about the Attorney-General. If I had said half as much against any officer of the United States as has been said against him, I would have brought in articles of impeachment against him if I believed what I said; if I did not, I would not have attacked a man who cannot defend himself. If there is anything more cowardly than that, I do not know what it is. But the charges have been made again and again here, and by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is not in his seat. If the Attorney-General has done one-half of what he is accused of, he should be impeached. But there is not a man on the other side of the House who dares to bring in a proposition for his impeachment, for he has no proof.

Now, I simply say that here is a high officer of the Government, the head of the Department of Justice. My amendment proposed that this power should be intrusted to him and to the Secretary of the Treasury, my object being to get rid of this cry that the power might be abused. The name of the Secretary of the Treasury has been struck out on a point of order. Now I say give this power to the Attorney-General; if he does not use it well, impeach him; and if he does use it well and saves money to the Treasury, I shall have done my duty, and this House will have done well in adopting the amendment.

Mr. POTTER. I have said nothing against or about the Attorney-General. I said that this is a power with which I would not trust anybody. In no State of this Union was any such power ever intrusted to any public officer.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And in no State of the Union are claims brought against the State to the extent of millions of dollars and a court empowered to bind the State government by its judgment in favor of such claims.

Mr. POTTER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, which was to increase the appropriation from $30,000 to $80,000 and to add to the paragraph the following:

Fifty thousand dollars of which may be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General in procuring evidence for the defeat of fraudulent claims against the United States brought in the courts of the United States: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid for any evidence, or document to be used as evidence, unless the claim shall be finally defeated because of the evidence so procured, to which fact the Attorney-General shall certify.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment; and there were—ayes 79, noes 64.

Mr. ASHE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I shall ask the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General in the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States, $25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. I make this motion because I want the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to tell us, if he can, the manner in which this money was expended last year. This appropriation is merely a repetition of one contained in the act of last year.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not able to tell the gentleman how the money has been expended during the past year.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been some public criticism in regard to the manner of this expenditure.

Mr. GARFIELD. I asked the Attorney-General in regard to this when he was before the Committee on Appropriations, and he explained the necessity of a provision of this sort in connection with the collection of the internal revenue, especially the tax on whisky. In the remote districts, away off in the mountains, you cannot find out illicit distilleries except by the use of detectives. The marshal is too well known for this purpose. Wherever he goes the violators of the law keep out of his way. He must employ somebody not known to be in the service of the Government—in other words, he must employ detectives—to go into particular neighborhoods to ascertain whether any illicit distillery or anything of that sort is being carried on there.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite as anxious as the gentleman from Ohio or the Attorney-General can be to have all the revenues of the Government reach the Treasury. But there has been some criticism as to the manner in which this money has been expended. I had hoped therefore that the gentleman was possessed of some record, some letter, some report which would indicate to the House the manner in which this fund was expended during the past year. The duty which he speaks of as necessary to be performed by the employment of detectives would seem to my mind to be covered by the three million appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no. The fund which is here asked for is one the expenditure of which cannot in its very nature be exhibited in detail. It ought not to be. To give the names of all persons employed in a service like this would very soon defeat the object of the appropriation. I do not believe that until the millennium comes we can get along without something of the spy system. We are compelled to adopt it in war, and I think we even went too far in rejecting it in reference to moieties last year. If we undertake to omit this feature in the detection of crime, it is far worse than if it were merely omitted in the enforcement of the law.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will observe that if he could tell us how this money was expended last year, we should be able to decide more intelligently as to the propriety of such an expenditure.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is very true. But the gentleman will also observe that if I did know (as I do not) how this money has been expended, and if I should undertake to state the details of its expenditure, the very object of such an appropriation would be in a large measure defeated.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move an amendment so as to make the amount of the appropriation in the pending paragraph $20,000. For one I do not object to giving the proper Department some money as a secret-service fund, or rather as a contingent fund to meet unusual and extraordinary expenses. But it does seem to me that we are drifting into a state of very great confusion in regard to the fund for this detective or secret service to which the gentleman from Ohio has alluded. We give the Secretary of the Treasury each year a very considerable sum of money for the purpose of employing a secret-service force; and under this provision numbers of detectives rove all over the country to look after every conceivable class of crime. We also allow the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a very considerable sum to be used in the detection of violations of the internal-revenue laws. We are now asked to give $25,000 to the Attorney-General, which, as the gentleman from Ohio states, is to be used, at least in part, for hunting out illicit distilleries and matters of that sort, coming properly under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

It does seem to me we are in these different ways employing quite a large number of men under different officers of the Government to travel over the same ground and do the same service. What is the result? You catch one of these detectives in "putting up some job," as it is called, upon some honest citizen, or assisting in some safe-burglary, if you please, or in any kind of transaction which brings dishonor on the service, and you find one Department insisting it is not responsible and another that it is not responsible, and thus we are unable to trace any direct responsibility to any proper source.

I insist whatever is given for this branch of the service ought to be under one responsible officer, to be controlled and directed by him, and that we ought not to peddle it out in this way, leaving the Attorney-General to appoint one class of these detectives, the Solicitor of the Treasury Department another portion, and then to have still another class under the general employment of the Treasury Department for the same purpose. We have, too, the Post-Office Department detectives, and so on in reference to all the Departments, until we do not know how many in all are employed in this business under the Government; so that when they are caught, as too many of them are, outside of the line of their duty, it is impossible to tell who is responsible for their conduct.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the chairman of the committee has no response to make to my remarks, of course I will withdraw it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment and ask for a vote.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have withdrawn my amendment.

Mr. BROMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I renew the motion to strike out the entire section made a while ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] I listened to the explanation of the chairman as to the distinction between offenses and crimes, but I could not follow him. I think this section is entirely covered by the $3,000,000 appropriation. I cannot understand how the Committee on Appropriations can come and ask us to vote an indefinite amount without any specification as to the use to be made of these large sums of money.

I send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read what I intended to have read at the time we had the three-million appropriation under consideration, but I failed to do so because I could not get the floor for that purpose.

I ask the Clerk to read the extracts I have marked from the testimony taken in the Alabama investigation.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOBILE, January 2, 1875.

ROBERT W. HEALY, called by the minority, sworn.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Question. State your residence and official position.

Answer. I reside at Montgomery, Alabama; I am at present marshal of the United States for the southern district of Alabama; I have held the position eight years lacking a month or two.

Q. You have held it then since Alabama was reconstructed?

A. I have held it since about the 1st of April, 1867, before the passage of the reconstruction acts.

Q. While you have been marshal have you received any written or printed instructions from the Attorney-General or Secretary of War as to your duties during the last two years?

A. I have never received any instructions from the Secretary of War of any kind, but I have received instructions from the Attorney-General.

Q. Did you appoint any United States deputy marshals during the last two years?

A. I did.

Q. How many deputies did you appoint for your district, and when were they appointed?

A. I appointed in some counties one for each beat, and for others I appointed but two or three for the whole county, and in some none at all.

Q. A beat is a voting precinct?

A. Yes, sir; they call them beats.

Q. When did you appoint those deputy marshals?

A. I think the appointments were all made during the month of October last.

Q. Can you tell the counties in which you appointed any deputies?

A. I prefer to wait till I can show you the list, which I have in Montgomery.

Q. Upon whose recommendation did you appoint these men in October last?

A. Sometimes I appointed on the recommendations of men in the counties, but most of them I appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Mayer, the chairman of the State executive republican committee.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you have anything to do with the location of the troops?

A. No, sir; not with the location. Some of the citizens of Barbour County wrote me asking me to have detachments of troops sent to two or three little places in that county. I had no authority to make the order at all, and I wrote to General McDowell asking that this be done, and he said in reply that stationing of troops was done only upon the suggestion of the Attorney-General, and that I must address myself to him. I just forwarded the application of these people to the Attorney-General after that, and I have never received any response to it as yet; yet detachments were stationed as requested afterward.

Mr. BROMBERG. And yet the Committee on Appropriations comes in here and asks you to put $3,000,000 into the hands of the Attorney-General of the United States without any account being rendered for services exactly like this referred to in the extracts I have read. They ask the same amount this year, when there is no canvass to be made and no extraordinary requirements are imposed upon the Department. They ask just as much now as when they wanted $3,000,000 to cover the whole South with deputy marshals.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. How much compensation do these marshals get?

Mr. BROMBERG. That is what I want to know exactly. How much do they get?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask whether they get anything at all?

Mr. BUCKNER. What do you think they were appointed for?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman by saying that this appropriation has been in year after year and has nothing to do with the number of marshals at all, but relates wholly to the detection and making way for suits in the courts. The three million appropriation is for prosecutions before the courts, and not for getting up evidence, for finding out crimes and bringing the criminals before the courts.

Mr. BROMBERG. I understand the gentleman that while these large appropriations are necessary, he cannot state for what particular purposes the money is to be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BROMBERG. Of course, in regard to this appropriation of $25,000, it is to be applied to payment of detective services, but I say that in this and in other paragraphs of appropriations for this Department there is gross vagueness and looseness. Not a single account is rendered here. When it has been shown here that millions of dollars have been placed in the hands of the Attorney-General for marshal's fees, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations cannot tell anywhere within a hundred thousand dollars what has been done with the money.

The question ought not to be a difficult one to answer. It applies not only to the $25,000 in this paragraph, but to every section in this clause making appropriations for the Judiciary. I shall therefore vote against every one of them until the committee can come here and make an intelligible statement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to say something in reference to the subject-matter of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] as to the appointment of these marshals.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move it for the purpose of making a statement in reference to these deputy marshals. I wish to say that so far as the southern district of Alabama is concerned these civil officers have been used as mere electioneering agents. There were appointed as many as two hundred or three hundred deputy marshals under the pretext that they were necessary to protect the ballot-boxes and see that the members of Congress were duly elected. These men, whether paid anything or not, were, beyond all sort of controversy, appointed and put there to operate on the election.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have not time now; I will hear the gentleman afterward. There never was such a thing before in the State of Alabama; there never was before any such appointment of deputy marshals; and they were authorized, if not appointed, at the suggestion of the Attorney-General. These men were invariably appointed by the chairman of the republican committee at the suggestion of the members of Congress and others controlling in the State. These deputy marshals were themselves some of them candidates on the State ticket. They had upon them the badge of the Federal Government as its officers, and were there in densely populated districts coercing the negro from his disposition to vote the democratic ticket. That is in evidence here. [Laughter.] Gentlemen laugh at that statement; but I say the evidence was that until the sending of troops and marshals and the greasing with the overflowed bacon there was a disposition all through Alabama among the negroes to vote the democratic ticket just as elsewhere.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PELHAM. I rise to a personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] has been recognized.

Mr. PELHAM. I want to contradict the gentleman's statement about the overflowed bacon.

Mr. BUCKNER. I want to read——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] has expired and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.]

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If I have the floor, I wish to say that the employment of marshals and of supervisors at the elections was for the purpose of securing in the State of Alabama fair elections, and there is no evidence that a marshal or supervisor interfered in any manner or in any respect at the election at all. And I say that there is no evidence that the marshals or supervisors, in any respect or in any manner, had anything to do with bacon or attempted to use any of it for purposes that had anything to do with the election or matters connected with the political campaign.

Now, sir, it is alleged that these marshals and supervisors were used for the purpose of coercing the negroes to vote the republican ticket. Sir, there was no such effort made. The negroes were disposed all the time to vote the republican ticket, as they are in other Southern States; but when the effort was made to prevent them from holding political meetings and to intimidate them by violence and by outrages and when murders and assassinations had been committed and perpetrated, then the marshals were appointed so that there should be that fair play at elections which is guaranteed to men everywhere under the Constitution.

Now, sir, I believe it to be the fact, and the testimony will show it, that the marshals received no compensation unless they made arrests upon legal process. They were not paid for any service rendered, nor is there an allegation that they abused any privileges or that they were at all engaged in any system of terrorism, nor any species of tyranny in the exercise of their offices. I believe there is not a particle of affirmative evidence on that point, and had there been no marshals and United States supervisors on the day of election in many places the negroes could not have voted at all unless they had voted the democrat ticket.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask leave, in connection with what I stated a few moments ago, to read a letter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question being taken on Mr. BUCKNER'S amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend by striking out the last two words.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] I want to say to that gentleman and to my friend from Alabama [Mr. PELHAM] that the overflowed bacon was used in Opelika, Alabama, to control the negro vote against the conservative party; that over twenty thousand pounds of it was sent seventy-five miles from the overflowed country and to Mr. Betts, who was the radical candidate for Congress, and was used by the radical party at Opelika in controlling the negro vote. The testimony taken at Opelika also shows that this bacon was sent out on the day before the election to a congressional district remote from the overflowed lands and used to feed republican voters, the democratic colored men being refused any part of it.

Now I want to send up to the Clerk's desk and have read an affidavit from a deputy marshal on that subject.

Mr. PELHAM. The statement that the bacon was sent into any congressional district remote from the overflowed lands is untrue.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have an affidavit here which I ask to have read.

Mr. PELHAM. I say that not a pound of it was issued——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have stated that this bacon was consigned to Mr. Betts, nearly seventy-five miles from the overflowed country, and that it was used in a certain locality to control the colored vote, according to the evidence which was before the committee, and it was so used by republican voters on the day prior to the election, excepting nine casks, which were seized by Army officers. We had a deputy marshal subpœnaed before the committee, but were unable to obtain his attendance. I ask the Clerk to read the affidavit which I send up for the information of the House, and particularly for the information of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] and Mr. PELHAM.

The Clerk proceeded to read the affidavit, but before concluding the hammer fell.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] who has talked about deputy marshals under the enforcement act being appointed by General Healy, the United States marshal, on the recommendation of the chairman of the republican State central committee of Alabama. The evidence fails to show that appointments of these deputies were refused on the recommendation of either party. The practice is to appoint these deputy marshals upon the recommendation of each political party; and if none were appointed upon the recommendation of the democratic central committee, it was for the reason such appointments were not asked. The evidence taken by the Alabama committee, however, shows that many of the deputy marshals on duty on election day at Mobile were democrats; but while we are talking about deputy marshals, I will call attention to the fact that the evidence shows that over one hundred armed deputy sheriffs, all democrats, and not a single republican, were appointed by the partisan democratic sheriff, and this, too, generally upon the recommendation of the chairman of the democratic central committee, and that these deputy sheriffs, armed, were continually passing along the streets, going from one ward or voting place to another; so if gentlemen want to go into the appointment of deputies, I will meet them half way in the inquiry.

Mr. BROMBERG. If the evidence says that those deputy sheriffs were armed, it is not true.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. One word now in reply to the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL.]

Mr. BROMBERG rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have but a word to say in reply to the gentleman from California. He sends an affidavit to the Clerk's desk to be read as a part of his remarks of a man by the name of Carpenter, who claims to have been a deputy marshal, who says he prostituted his office to improper uses while serving process.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman is mistaken. It is not the affidavit of Mr. Carpenter. It is the affidavit of a republican United States marshal appointed by General Healy.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not mistaken. It is a deputy marshal who makes the affidavit, merely ex parte, that he prostituted process that was placed in his hands for service; and this man, who, by his own statement in the very affidavit which the gentleman files, says that he prostituted his office, thereby breaking his official oath, furnishes the gentleman this affidavit, and the gentleman hastens to have the same read as a truthful statement. How much dependence can you put in the voluntary statement of a man whose very statement shows his own infamy? This is the same man who hastens to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] after the election, at his home in Mobile, and makes his statement about these same matters, which the gentleman from Alabama details in his evidence before the investigating committee as in his opinion a reliable, truthful statement as to matters therein contained. Sir, the evidence shows no misconduct upon the part of these deputy marshals, and this affidavit is read to cast opprobrium upon those who acted as deputy marshals in Alabama. It will not do. No just man would hang a dog upon such evidence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SHEATS. I move to strike out the last four words of the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, I must insist upon the debate being confined to the pending amendment.

Mr. SHEATS. I have never bothered this House with any remarks yet.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; then I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. SHEATS. I wish to make some remarks directly pertinent to the amendment that I offer.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] has alluded to the conduct of men in Alabama with the bacon that was sent down there. I think I know as much about the disposition of that bacon as the gentleman from California. I assert that there never was a pound of that bacon used to influence voters in any respect.

I will say another thing, that if there was bacon sent down there by the Federal Government, there never were any Ku-Klux or white-leaguers encouraged there by that bacon. And they who charge, let them be deputy marshals or anybody else, that the republicans influenced or intimidated democratic voters in Alabama, either with bacon or by any other improper means they lie. The intimidation down there was by the white-leaguers and Ku-Klux, who ride at the dead hour of night and murder and outrage men under all circumstances. I have nothing to say more than to give a refutation to the charge that intimidation was used on the part of republicans in Alabama. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I renew the amendment to the amendment, and ask that the remainder of the affidavit be read, and then I will conclude my remarks.

A MEMBER. That will take up all your time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Never mind the reading of it, then; I will state what it contains. This man, Mr. Perrin, United States marshal, recommended by the State central committee of the republican party in Alabama, swears that he prepared three hundred blank warrants at the request of the chairman of that committee, Mr. Maher, and placed the names of leading democratic or conservative citizens on the back of these blank warrants; and on the 27th day of October, 1874, made a requisition on the commander of the military post at Mobile for a detachment of soldiers to enforce writs of the United States court; but said writs had no existence, such requisition being made at the request of the chairman of the republican State and district executive committee of Alabama and with the concurrence of members of said committee. The real object of asking for such troops was to place them in the most central portion of the democratic district and intimidate democratic voters by causing reports to be circulated that warrants for the arrest of a large number of white citizens were to be issued. The result was that many white citizens, rather than suffer arrest and maltreatment and the expense and trouble of a trial, with unscrupulous witnesses to testify against them, preferred to leave, and did leave the country. This action encouraged the more partisan and turbulent negroes to unite the colored men against the whites, and enabled the republicans to vote them as they pleased.

Mr. Perrin also swears that three and a half hogsheads of bacon were placed at his disposal, and notice was given that on a certain day he would issue the bacon to colored persons who would vote the republican ticket. He also swears that he issued a notice that on the 3d day of November he would give a barbecue. This caused a large influx of negroes, and at least 500 illegal votes were cast then and there for the republican candidates.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I want to know what is the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has moved an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I want to know what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am satisfied the gentleman does not want to know what I am talking about, but simply to interrupt the reading of the affidavit.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I want to know what the amendment is, so that I can understand what you are saying.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am not responsible for the gentleman's stupidity.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Neither am I for yours.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I see a disposition on the part of some members to refuse to have this affidavit read.

Mr. MOREY. Let it all be read; I should like to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of it will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will then ask that it be printed in the RECORD so that all can read it.

Many MEMBERS. O, read; read.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The object of that is simply to take up time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman call for the further reading of the paper?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will state what it is.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from California has charged this side of the House with preventing the reading of that affidavit.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have not so charged the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it be read.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I made no charge against you.

Mr. CONGER. You made it against some members.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then it does not affect you.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it be read.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If it does not come out of my time, I ask that it be read, or else printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CESSNA. Does the gentleman know of his own personal knowledge that it is genuine and was ever made by anybody?

Mr. STORM. We all know what these remarks are made for.

Mr. SPEER. It is to consume the gentleman's time.

Mr. NEGLEY. That is an unfair charge. The gentleman himself asked to have it read, and I demand that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the further reading of the paper during the remainder of the five minutes.

Mr. SPEER. The effect of that will be to cut the gentleman off from his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asked to have it read as a part of his speech.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And afterward I withdrew the request and offered to state the substance of the affidavit.

Many MEMBERS. Read; read.

Mr. LUTTRELL. You may hallo "read" until you are hoarse in your effort to drown the voice of the people and to stifle free speech. This is an affidavit by one of your own republican marshals, recommended by the Alabama State central committee, and it contains statements which the republican party in this House do not desire to hear, as the facts contained therein are enough to make the very imps of the infernal region blush with shame.

Several MEMBERS. Order! Order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored, and the officers of the House will enforce the orders of the Chair.

After order had been restored,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from California has a perfect right to withdraw the written paper and proceed with his oral remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt whatever about that, and the Chair will see that he is protected in his rights.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the mean time how much of his time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored to enforce order as far as he could without partiality. The gentleman from California has introduced the paper as a part of his remarks and asked for its reading. His time was exhausted before the reading was concluded. Afterward he moved another amendment, and called for the reading of the remainder of the paper. If the Chair had understood his application when he made it to withdraw that call and proceed with his remarks he certainly would have ruled that it was his right to do so. The gentleman now has one minute more of his five minutes.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the gentleman will be allowed by unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes with his oral remarks.

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power under the rules to extend any gentleman's time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] for his courtesy. I have been interrupted from the beginning. I propose now to sit down, withdrawing this affidavit for the present to renewing the reading as soon as I can get the floor. All I ask of this House is that I may be allowed to submit my remarks, whatever they may be, and then let other gentlemen have the opportunity to reply as much and as often as they see fit. I am ready to meet them. I have some hundreds of affidavits of witnesses who could have been called, but which the committee in their haste did not see fit to examine, showing that the intimidation came from United States marshals and republican negroes, in maltreating, insulting, and otherwise abusing negroes who were disposed to vote the conservative ticket.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate. We have now had a discussion of three-quarters of an hour upon a question that has no relation to the subject under consideration.

Mr. PELHAM. This matter ought not to be discussed altogether upon one side; the gentleman from Ohio should give our side a chance.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4835) in relation to the Quartermaster's Department, fixing its status, reducing its numbers, and regulating appointments and promotions therein; and

An act (H. R. No. 1938) to provide for settlements with certain railway companies.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield the one minute allowed for debate on this question to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM.]

Mr. PELHAM. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I am not allowed a fuller opportunity to review what has been said by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who has made many statements in regard to this matter which to say the least are untrue. In the one minute allowed me I will only say that he is mistaken in stating that the bacon referred to was used by the candidate for Congress in the third district of Alabama to assist him politically or in any other manner. That statement is not true. The candidate for Congress was not appointed to distribute the bacon. The man appointed for that purpose was not at the time of his appointment a candidate for any office.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I did not say that the candidate for Congress was appointed to attend to that; but the bacon was consigned to him.

Mr. PELHAM. It was not consigned to him while he was a candidate.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The papers show it.

Mr. PELHAM. The papers do not show it, and the proof shows and the truth is that he never did issue or use one pound of it for any purpose.

Now, my colleague [Mr. BROMBERG] has spoken in regard to the practice of marshals in that section of the country. He has intimated that they are all dishonest, and charges the republican party with dishonesty. I have only to say in reply that when the republican party was first organized in Alabama we had quite a number of men in it who may have been guilty of some indiscretions. My colleague probably knows more about that matter than I do, because he occupied a more prominent position as a member of the executive committee of the republican party. Such may have been the practice then, but it is not now. If it was then, it ceased when he left the party and joined the opposition.

In reply to what was said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] in regard to the appointment of marshals, I will say that these marshals were not under pay; they were only appointed to prevent if possible the killing of men on election day. The democrats did have marshals, a great many of them. It is true they were not appointed by the Attorney-General or the marshal of the district; they received their appointments from another source, and were better organized and more effective than those appointed under known and written laws and authority.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. BROMBERG'S amendment.

Mr. BROMBERG. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For iron gratings for the windows and putting up the same in the building for penitentiary in the Territory of Montana, $1,200.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that last year we made an appropriation of $6,000 for a penitentiary in this Territory, provided that that sum would complete it. Now here is another appropriation for the same building. I do not move to strike it out; I only call attention to the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the continuation of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; by the first division, under F. V. Hayden, in Colorado and such adjacent portions of Utah and New Mexico as were not explored the preceding year, $60,000; and by the second division, under J. W. Powell, in Utah, $20,000; in all, $80,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the paragraph just read by making the first appropriation $75,000 instead of $60,000, the second appropriation $25,000 instead of $20,000, and by changing the aggregate from $80,000 to $100,000. The Committee on Appropriations believe they have cut that down further than was wise in view of what has been already begun.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Does the gentleman from Ohio propose to make a similar increase of appropriation on page 47 for geographical surveys for the Territories west of the one hundredth meridian?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If so, I have no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection of mining and mineral statistics, under charge of Professor Rossiter W. Raymond, the amount to be immediately available, to be expended, and to be for the completion of the work, $15,000.

Mr. COX. I move to strike that out and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For collection of mining statistics $10,000, to be spent under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the salary of the commissioner of mining statistics shall not exceed the rate of $3,000 per annum, and the commissioner's principal assistant $2,000 per annum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that changes the supervision of this work and makes this another matter altogether. It is new legislation, and not in order to this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Raymond is not responsible to anybody. I propose to place this matter under some officer of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. This appropriation concludes his work. It is made mainly to close up the work.

Mr. COX. If the amendment I have already moved is decided by the Chair to be out of order, I now move to reduce the appropriation from $15,000 to $10,000 and to add to it as a proviso what I have sent up to the Chair in my former amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the very part of the gentleman's proposition which is new legislation and against which my point of order was made.

Mr. COX. My object plainly is this, and I can state it briefly——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. This amendment is liable to two objections. In the first place, it reduces this salary under the guise of limiting the expenditure of this money; and, secondly, it is not germane to the paragraph providing for the collection of mining and mineral statistics. We might as well attempt here to fix the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury as to fix the salary of this officer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out $15,000 and insert $10,000, and will be glad to give my reasons for it. I do not believe it is possible to strike down any of these appropriation bills in this House. When I saw the other day a committee of this House suspend the rules and pass an appropriation bill containing $5,999,000, or in round numbers $6,000,000 of appropriations, without discussion and without examination, a mere log-rolling bill, through this House, I gave up any hope of reform or economy in this House for this short session. I only ask now to cut down this appropriation from $15,000 to $10,000. Why? Because this Mr. Raymond gets his $5,000 a year. He is not responsible to any officer. He is no officer himself. He is compiling statistics. He has an office in New York, goes to Europe, gets his information from the owners of mines, makes up his little book, and sends it to us to be printed at still further expense. He does his work in Europe, and we pay him the full salary of a member of Congress to get up this work. It is all wrong.

Mr. GARFIELD. I take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This matter of mining statistics came in regular course before the Committee on Appropriations. I had occasion personally to investigate it. I conferred with the Delegates from the Territories and others as to the object of this work. I found it was not only of great use, but that there was great demand for it. I found the work of Professor Raymond sought after and that nearly everywhere men bore testimony of the good kind of the work he is doing. Professor Raymond was sent for to come to Washington. He appeared before the committee and demonstrated that his investigations are not made in his office in New York or in trips to Europe, but that each year he spends certain months in visiting the mining regions. In addition to that he has correspondents all over the great West in connection with the great mining sections. When in New York he compiles whatever information he has derived from all these sources. That is his mode of doing his valuable work.

Now, it may be some satisfaction to the gentleman from New York, who says we never cut down appropriations, to be told that Professor Raymond expects this appropriation will finish this work unless Congress shall see fit to enlarge its scope or send him off elsewhere. The work he has been doing he cannot complete without the present appropriation. The committee believe it is a moderate one, and I believe we get valuable information in this way for every dollar we spend.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment and yield to the gentleman from Arizona, who will renew it.

Mr. McCORMICK. I renew the amendment pro forma.

I regret that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who is usually well informed on everything he undertakes to speak upon on this floor, has fallen into a mistake on this subject. Professor Raymond has been commissioner of mines and mining for several years, and his reports have been generally conceded to be among the most valuable documents published by Congress. So valuable have they been considered by the miners of the West that they have asked for an increased number of copies from year to year; and so important are they thought to be by the territorial Delegates that at a recent meeting they unanimously signed a letter to the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations, asking that this appropriation be made, and even a larger amount than that which has been reported could in their opinion wisely be given for the work in which Professor Raymond is engaged.

I have in my hand a letter from Professor Raymond, written in New York yesterday, in which he says he expected an attack of this kind. He does not say by whom, and I am much surprised that it should come from my friend from New York. I am sure he has been misled by some one jealous of Mr. Raymond's success, or wholly ignorant of his services to the Government.

I will ask the Clerk to read extracts from this letter.

The Clerk read the following:

The whole cost of the office in New York is about	$600
The secretary and stenographer cost	500

* * * * * * *

The commissioner and his single general assistant have traveled annually about twenty thousand miles in arranging for the collection of statistics, and as many local agents have been employed as could be got to work for nothing, or paid with the money appropriated. Let the reports speak for themselves as to their contents. They are quoted, translated, and praised all over Europe as valuable and complete pictures, not of single properties, but of the resources of the United States and the scientific methods in use among us for their development.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote now.

The question being put upon the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock, to enable me to go on with the sundry civil bill.

DISTRICT TAX BILL.

Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, from Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. 4840) for support of the government of the District of Columbia for fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. WELLS and Mr. STANDIFORD obtained leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the Texas Pacific Railway bill. (See Appendix.)

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that by unanimous consent the sundry civil appropriation bill, now under consideration of the Committee of the Whole, may be reprinted. The edition is exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORTS ON AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, the reports both of the majority and the minority of the Select Committee on Affairs in Arkansas were ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBURN. I move so to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the session of the House this evening may be devoted to the consideration of the bill reported by the Select Committee on Affairs in Alabama.

The SPEAKER. That could not be done except by general consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. We want to finish these appropriation bills.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask the indulgence of the House to make a brief personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. SYPHER. During the discussion on Monday evening on the bill regulating the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia, the member from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] used the following language. I read from the report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

I do not believe there is a State in this Union whose people are obliged to pay $3.50 on each $100 of its actual cash value, unless indeed it may be the poor tax-cursed, crushed, and ruined States of the South, and I doubt if many of them are taxed to that extent.

Mr. SYPHER. I desire to say to the gentleman that taxation in Louisiana is 14½ mills on the $100.

My remark was 14½ mills on the dollar, not on $100 as reported.

Yesterday the member from Wisconsin rose to a personal explanation, and asked leave to print his corrected remarks in the RECORD, and under that pretense, by unanimous consent of the House, he printed in the RECORD this dirty fling at me:

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not want to hear from the gentleman from Louisiana. That people have suffered enough from his sort.

Now, sir, if there is any meaner sort than he and his sort, they must be mighty low down.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. RANDALL and others. Let the words be taken down.

Mr. SYPHER. If the language is unparliamentary I withdraw it. I do not wish to transcend the rules of the House, and do not think I have done so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I said that. I said it most distinctly at the time and meant it.

Mr. SYPHER. Attacking a member under the guise of printing a personal explanation in the RECORD is an act which deserves to be characterized as contemptible and cowardly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now insist on my motion.

Mr. ELDREDGE rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will waive the motion to allow the gentleman from Wisconsin to make a response for not more than the same length of time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yesterday I made no personal explanation. It is headed in the RECORD "Personal explanation," but I did not put that heading to it. I did not consider it a personal explanation. I corrected a mistake in the reporting of my speech. I reproduced the speech as nearly as possible which I made the night before, and asked leave to publish it because it had not been correctly reported. I have nothing to take back in that speech.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew my motion that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock, (Mr. TYNER occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the sundry civil appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in one minute. I am willing however to yield for motions that can be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution reported by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] in regard to Arkansas affairs was recommitted to the special committee on that subject.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I insist on mine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is not privileged.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. COBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether it will be in order to take up some other measure if the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] pending his motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the sundry civil appropriation bill, that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in one mimute.

The question was put on the motion to close debate; and no quorum voted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the motion to close debate and insist upon the former motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the question recurs upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 53, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. COBURN were appointed.

Mr. SPEER. I hope gentlemen will not insist on a division; there is evidently no quorum in the Hall.

Mr. COBURN. I insist on a further count.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 45.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a call of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion. We cannot see whether there be a quorum here or not unless the roll is called.

Mr. GARFIELD. A call of the House is the only thing in order now.

Many MEMBERS. O, no!

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion to adjourn; we can just as well test the question whether there is a quorum here or not by calling the yeas and nays upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You are a little late now in making that proposition, but I will withdraw the motion to adjourn and call the yeas and nays upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 90, not voting 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Creunse, Davis, Dawes, Durham, Finck, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Lawrence, Loughridge, Luttrell, Magee, McCrary, James W. McDill, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, O'Brien, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Poland, Randall, Ray, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, John Q. Smith, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Storm, Swann, Thompson, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Wood, and John D. Young—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Field, Freeman, Frye, Gunckel, Hagans, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hynes, Lamport, Lawson, Lowe, Lynch, Maynard, MacDougall, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Packard, Page, Parsons, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Sawyer, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—90.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Begole, Berry, Buffinton, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Creamer, Crossland, Crutchfield, Curtis, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, McNulta, Mitchell, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Orr, Orth, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—114.

So the motion was not agreed to.

During and after the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE. My colleague, Mr. ROBBINS, is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I desire to vote.

Mr. COBURN. Was the gentleman in the House when the last name on the roll was called?

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House when the last name on the roll was called, but came in while the roll was being verified, and as it has been the custom of members thus circumstanced to vote, I desire to record my vote in the affirmative. It is intimated by some that the practice of thus voting is not strictly within the rules of the House, and if such be the fact I withdraw the vote.

Mr. CONGER. I was not in the Hall while the roll was being called; if I had the right to vote I would vote "no."

Mr. BURCHARD. The Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am a member, is authorized to sit during the session of the House. I was not in until after the roll was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the committee in session?

Mr. BURCHARD. I presume it was not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman has no right to vote.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will say that if I had been present I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I was not in when the last name on the roll was called; if I had been here I would have voted "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move——

Mr. POLAND. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote recommitting the report and resolution reported from the committee on affairs in Arkansas.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I antagonized the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. I also moved to call up the motion to reconsider before the gentleman made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. Two days have passed by since the motion to recousider was made, and I have the same right to call it up as anybody else. I desire now to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions about Arkansas were recommitted to the committee. And I made that motion before the question was put on going into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as calling up the motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] calls up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Arkansas Affairs was recommitted to that committee.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question of consideration.

Mr. COBURN. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to state that if the House shall refuse to consider the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] I shall renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to speak upon the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COBURN. I raised the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman want to hear the rule read?

Mr. COBURN. I will hear it read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When any motion or proposition is made, the question "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker. And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report, even though a question of privilege is involved in the report.

Mr. COBURN. All I desire to say is that I raised the question of consideration as between the report of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and the bill which has been reported from the Special Committee upon Political Affairs in Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HYNES. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the effect of a negative vote on this question of consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is competent for the majority of the House to determine whether or not they will consider the motion of reconsideration called up by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] If the House shall determine in the negative, then that question will not be before the House.

Mr. COBURN. And then any other question may be entertained.

Mr. HYNES. If the reconsideration is refused now, does that impair in any way the privilege of that motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is only an indication of the sense of the House not now to consider that motion.

Mr. HYNES. What will be the effect of that upon the privileged character of the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. None at all. The gentleman from Vermont calls up the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the report of the Committee on Arkansas Affairs was recommitted to that committee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raises the question of consideration on that report. The question now is, will the House now consider the motion to reconsider?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 101, noes 72.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. Try tellers first.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the motion to reconsider is not now considered, will it be in order for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] to rise and make his report at any time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House shall refuse to consider the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to submit a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And if we vote that down, will the Chair recognize the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be sufficient for the Chair to determine whom he will recognize at that time.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to say, without meaning any imputation upon the Chair, that it seems to me that it would be very unjust to the gentleman from Indiana if the Chair shall not recognize him in case this motion is voted down. The gentleman from Ohio has once been recognized, and therefore the Chair ought to recognize some other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The response of the Chair to the gentleman is that the motion to suspend the rules will take precedence of any other motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. But it has once been voted down to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nevertheless it may be submitted again. The Chair considers it his duty to recognize gentlemen who have propositions to submit in reference to the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] calls for the yeas and nays on the question of considering the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Arkansas Affairs was recommitted.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 15, nays 182, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Bundy, Burleigh, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hynes, Loughridge, McCrary, Pierce, Poland, Charles W. Willard, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Caulfield, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Field, Finck, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Gunter, Hagans, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Kasson, Lamar, Lamport, Lawson, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McLean, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Negley, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Charles A. Stevens, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wood, and John D. Young—182.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bass, Begole, Berry, Buffinton, Roderick R. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cox, Creamer, Crossland, Crutchfield, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niles, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Shanks, Sloss, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Whiteley, Wilber, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—90.

So the House refused to consider the motion to reconsider.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SHERWOOD. My colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD, is necessarily absent to-night. If he were present he would vote "no."

Mr. SHELDON. The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. WHITELEY, is detained from the House in consequence of sickness. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. ARCHER. My colleague from Maryland, Mr. WILSON, is detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. GARFIELD. In pursuance of the motion which I made to-day for a recess, that this evening might be devoted to the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill, I now move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into committee on that bill.

Mr. COBURN. I raise the question of consideration between that bill and the bill that has been reported from the Special Committee on Alabama Affairs.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mine is a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to suspend the rules takes precedence.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order. My point is that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has already made one motion to go into committee, which has been voted down, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] or some other gentleman has now the right to be recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides otherwise and recognizes the gentleman from Ohio. He clearly has the right to make a motion to suspend the rules.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD, there were—ayes 116, noes 126.

Mr. STONE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to save time I demand the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent now for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to withdraw his motion?

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has no right to object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has not the gentleman from Ohio the right to withdraw his motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He can, if he desires to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the question be tested first by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe I must test the sense of the House on this question.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Davis, Dawes, Durham, Eames, Finck, Fort, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunter, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Kasson, Knapp, Lamar, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, O'Neill, Pierce, Poland, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Swann, Thompson, Tyner, Vance, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Field, Frye, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hynes, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nunn, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—116.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Averill, Barnum, Bass, Berry, Buffinton, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Crutchfield, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Hathorn, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Alexander S. McDill, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niles, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Shanks, Sherwood, Sloss, William A. Smith, Southard, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Whiteley, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—78.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

During the vote,

Mr. ROBBINS stated that his colleague, Mr. LEACH, who was absent from the Hall on account of sickness, was paired with the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. SHERWOOD stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD, who if present would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. RANDALL objected.

Mr. RANDALL said: Mr. Speaker, I change my vote from "ay" to "no."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is, to reconsider.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole; and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, I make this point of order and ask the ruling of the Chair upon it: that a motion to reconsider a vote upon consideration is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I never heard that a motion to reconsider was not in order.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CESSNA. I make the point that it is not in order. The motion to go into committee has been twice voted on and twice voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees nothing in the point. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] moves to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. MILLS. Pending that I move the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not the new rule come in here?

Mr. RANDALL. My motion is of higher privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will be entitled to the floor to make his motion as soon as the motion to reconsider has been definitely settled; but no motion is in order until the door of reconsideration is closed one way or other.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. HEREFORD. And on that motion I demand tellers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us have the yeas and nays, as the tellers only take up time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to suggest a way out of this difficulty. I understand the motions now made on the other side of the House will be withdrawn if the report from the Committee on Elections can be taken up and considered at this time.

Mr. HYNES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to suspend the rules in order? The motion which was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was a motion to suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I ask the Chair whether the motion to reconsider that vote is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the impression, on the technical point, that it has been frequently reconsidered; that is, the vote by which the House refused to go into committee. Both the vote of the House refusing to go into committee and the vote of the House agreeing to suspend the rules and go into committee have been allowed to be reconsidered. The motion to suspend the rules, to which the motion to reconsider does not apply, is the two-thirds vote on Monday.

Mr. HYNES. I understand that. I wish to suggest to the Speaker whether the intention and logic of the motion to reconsider is not to get rid of the action of the House? Is not this an evasion of the action of the House by refusing to go into committee?

The SPEAKER. It only involves a single vote.

Mr. HYNES. I understand that; but it is so much time lost.

The SPEAKER. The opposite decision might involve grave consideration if the House could not reconsider the vote to go into committee. At the outside it can only involve a single vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. CESSNA. I submit another proposition on the point of order raised by me a moment ago. There has been no ruling of the House on this point since the adoption of the new rule. Now, it is perfectly evident the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is a dilatory motion. The motion to adjourn then makes two dilatory motions, and that clearly is in violation of the new rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot decide a motion to reconsider is a dilatory motion; for if the vote had been carried in the affirmative, the gentleman might move to reconsider and lay that motion to reconsider upon the table. It cannot be construed as a dilatory motion. It is a motion absolutely inherent in the direct motion. Pending the motion to adjourn the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. CESSNA. I make the point of order that that is a dilatory motion under the new rule.

The SPEAKER. The new rule allows two dilatory motions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, you have got the two dilatory motions now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday.

Mr. ROBBINS. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 141, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Henry R. Harris, John T. Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—141.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bass, Berry, Buffinton, Bundy, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Eugene Hale, Robert S. McDill, Milliken, Mitchell, Morey, Neal, Nesmith, Niles, Orr, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Randall, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sherwood, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—84.

So the motion was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SHERWOOD said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER.) The question recurs on the motion to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CESSNA. Before the Clerk begins to call the roll, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order for me at this time, or for any other gentleman on this side of the House, to give notice to the other side that every minute of time occupied in these dilatory motions shall be deducted from the time we intended to allow for the discussion of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 133, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McKee, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, John G. Schumaker, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—84.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SHERWOOD said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 7, not voting 149; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Mr. O'BRIEN. I would inquire of the Chair if that is a quorum of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not a quorum.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CESSNA. Before that motion is put, I raise a question of order that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] was in his seat and did not vote.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I did vote and my name is recorded.

Mr. CESSNA. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. If he did vote, I cannot of course make the point of order on him, and I do not desire to make it.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. O'BRIEN that there be a call of the House; and on a division there were—ayes 108, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. There is evidently a quorum in the Hall.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the call of the House will divulge that fact, if there be one here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is evidently a quorum in the Hall, and I desire to know if it is not in the power of the House to require members here present, in their seats, to vote?

The SPEAKER. The rule makes it the absolute duty of members in their seats to vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If a member will not vote is there no way in which the House can compel him to do it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no way of making a horse drink, although you may lead him to water.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am not dealing with horses now or any such reasonable animals.

Mr. CESSNA. We are dealing with a different kind of animals.

Mr. HYNES. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether this is not an attempt to defeat the recent amendment of the rules by which filibustering was stopped, and if gentlemen who are present in their seats cannot be compelled to vote, as for instance the gentleman from Pennsylvania on my left, [Mr. RANDALL,] who I know was in his seat and did not vote? I raise that as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will indicate any mode by which a member can be compelled to vote the Chair will be glad to enforce it.

Mr. HYNES. I will do so. I will move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania on my left [Mr. RANDALL] be compelled to vote under the rules of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If it is in order, I move that that motion be laid upon the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a call of the roll, the House having ordered a call.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand that the rules require that every member who is in his seat shall vote unless excused by the House. Is there no way in which a member present can be compelled to vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never known a way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then it is time we found out one. The rules seem to be only to keep us from doing anything in the way of business.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then the rules are of no use whatever, if that be so.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the majority of the House can find some way to compel gentlemen either to vote or leave the House.

The SPEAKER. The moment a majority of the House appear to be voting, then it is of no consequence who do not vote.

Mr. CESSNA. It amounts to just this then, that some of our friends are not sufficiently healthy to be present, and because they are not business must be stopped.

Mr. CONGER. In order to save the rules of the House harmless, I will move that the names of those who have not voted be now called in order that an opportunity may be given them to vote, or the rest of us here can ask that they be excused.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not permit any gentleman to vote after the result has been announced.

Mr. MAYNARD. No result has been announced.

The SPEAKER. There has been an announcement of a failure to reach a result.

Mr. PIERCE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the House.

Mr. HYNES. I ask the Chair to rule upon my point of order. Is it not in the power of the House to compel a member to vote?

Mr. O'BRIEN. How do you know there are any here who did not vote?

Mr. HYNES. I saw some here who did not vote; I will designate as one the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no way by which that rule can be enforced.

Mr. HYNES. As the Chair says he knows of no means by which a member who is here in his place can be compelled to vote——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair did not so decide; he only decided that you could not make a horse drink.

Mr. HYNES. I move that the House compel members present to vote.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Is not a member who is in his seat and refusing to vote when his name is called in contempt of the House?

The SPEAKER. It never has been so ruled, because if that was so it would bring a great many members in contempt of the House every day.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I did not say members refraining from voting, but refusing to vote.

The SPEAKER. Members will do well to recollect that this is a frequent and annually recurring experience of the House; it is not a new thing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is a rule of the House bearing directly upon this question. As the rules bind us upon every other question and in every other respect, why should not members be bound in this respect? As the rules are enforced in every other case against doing business, why not enforce them now so as to do business?

The SPEAKER. The whole trouble arises from this fact: The point is made against certain members who are present that they do not vote. It is the duty of members of the House primarily before voting that they should attend the sessions of the House. The whole trouble arises from the fact that certain members whose duty it is to attend are not here. If they were here, then this difficulty would not arise.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What good would it do if they did not vote?

Mr. CESSNA. If the call of the House is proceeded with as ordered, would it be in order to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in first the republican members who are absent?

Mr. STORM. The understanding when the recess was ordered was that the session of the House to-night was to be for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill; it was upon that understanding that members came here. It is a violation of good faith to insist that we shall consider other business.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that there shall be a call of the House, and the Clerk will now proceed to call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The roll-call shows the presence of 221 members.

Mr. SENER. I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUFFINTON, has leave of absence.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the doors be closed.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will see that the doors are closed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the absentees be sent for, so that we need not have to go over this proceeding again.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My colleague, Mr. BUFFINTON, is detained from the House by sickness, and he has leave of absence.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask whether it is not in order now to offer excuses for absent members?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MONROE, who has been here all the evening until a few minutes ago, is troubled with a severe sore throat and had to go home.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is this proceeding in accordance with any order?

Mr. COBURN. To save time I will simply ask whether it is proper now for members to be giving excuses for absentees?

Mr. SPEER. This is the proper time to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; the proper time and the only time is when the absentees are brought in.

The SPEAKER. Members who have good excuses for being absent ought not to be brought in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Of course the Speaker will not issue his warrant against any member who is absent under leave of House.

Mr. SPEER. Would you issue a warrant to compel a sick member to be brought here?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Who is to answer whether a man is sick or not?

Mr. COBURN. A member who is sick might send in his excuse by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. SMALL. My colleague, Mr. PIKE, is necessarily absent this evening, and is paired with some gentleman on the other side.

Mr. O'BRIEN. My colleague, Governor SWANN, has been obliged by sickness to go home. He is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. WARD. I ask that he be excused.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague, Mr. HOUGHTON, is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I insist on my point that this is not regular.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that a warrant be issued for the absentees.

Mr. SENER. Pending that motion, is it not in order to move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SENER. I make that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. KASSON. Is this the proper time to offer an excuse for an absent member? If so, I wish to move that the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BECK, (who as the House knows has a broken arm and has gone home feeling unable to remain) be excused.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When the roll is called for excuses that will be the time to make them.

Mr. CESSNA. There is no danger that our Sergeant-at-Arms will bring here any member who is sick.

Mr. SPEER. But it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to execute the order of the House.

Mr. CESSNA. I know that, but not against a sick member.

Mr. COBURN. The Sergeant-at-Arms can make return that the member is sick.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on this subject; and the Chair asks members to give attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon calls of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted. After which the names of the absentees shall again be called over. The doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.—Rule 36.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the strict construction of this rule excuses for members are in order before the warrant is issued for those whom the House deems to have no excuse. It is the practice to hear these excuses verbally stated by consent.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUFFINTON, be excused on account of sickness.

A MEMBER. He has been excused.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has indefinite leave of absence from the House, and therefore he does not need to be excused.

Mr. KASSON. I move that Mr. BECK be excused.

Mr. SPEER. I move that Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, be excused on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Before hearing the excuse of any member the Chair is compelled to submit the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. That motion, if adopted, would of course obliterate this whole record.

Mr. SENER. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. CONGER. The doors should be closed before that question is taken.

The SPEAKER. That was done immediately upon the conclusion of the roll-call.

The question recurred on Mr. SENER'S motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. RANDALL demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were, ayes 32, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 177, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Ashe, Barber, Bell, Brown, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Crittenden, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, John T. Harris, Harrison, Kellogg, Knapp, Isaac C. Parker, Potter, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, Sener, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Waldron, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, and George Willard—27.

During the vote,

Mr. TODD said: Mr. Speaker, is it in order for members to pass out of the door during the roll-call when the doors have been ordered to be closed on a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is the custom to allow members to go out on registering their names, and to return. They go and come upon their personal honor to return, and are registered to that effect.

Mr. SHELDON stated that Mr. BECK and Mr. PARSONS had both gone home sick, and before leaving had paired, but he could not say how they would vote on this question.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. MOREY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. O'BRIEN. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CESSNA. I think we ought to understand this thing right here, and I therefore make the point of order that the motion just made is not in order.

The SPEAKER. On what grounds?

Mr. CESSNA. That it is dilatory merely. I wish the ruling of the Chair on that point as I did on the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 61, not voting 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, White, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Finck, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Knapp, Lamar, Magee, Marshall, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Waldron, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Willie, and Wood—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Bass, Beck, Blount, Buffinton, Bundy, Cannon, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Crutchfield, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hathorn, Havens, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lowndes, Maynard, Alexander S. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—91.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SPEER. Now I insist on my motion that the gentleman from Georgia, MR. STEPHENS, be excused on account of illness.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call up my motion to send for the absentees.

Mr. SPEER. I insist that my motion is first in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the attention of members to what is the rule of the House upon this case:

The doors shall then be shut—

That is, when a call has been ordered, a quorum having failed to appear—and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

The language of the rule is not absolutely clear whether, as regards the making of excuses, it refers to the time when the member appears, or whether it refers to the time before he appears.

Mr. SPEER. Before he appears.

Mr. NIBLACK. What has been the practice?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has in his hand at this moment the Journal of the House of February 5, 1858, which embraces a very long process, covering many pages, in which the yeas and nays were called upon propositions to excuse members.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let me make a suggestion. If the excuse be disposed of before the member is sent for, it will depend substantially upon what is the feeling and the temper of the House, without hearing the party.

The SPEAKER. Yes, if the excuse be taken beforehand; but if you send for the member first, you may send for a man, under the mandate of the House, whose coming from his home in an inclement night may be dangerous to his life.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If I may be permitted I would make this suggestion, that that is true of all legal and judicial processes whatever. You order the sheriff to arrest a man, you order the arrest of a witness for contempt, and finding a witness in such a condition is a sufficient excuse from serving the process. But if the question of the validity of the excuse is to be adjudged by the House now, it not only destroys practically the power of the House to have a call of the House, but it also involves the impropriety of adjudging the question of contempt of the House without hearing the party.

Mr. BURCHARD. If you excuse a man, that is the end of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now desire to make this motion: I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed——

Mr. RANDALL. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is the regular order, in my judgment. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to go for such members as are absent, and to bring in those who in his judgment are not disabled by sickness from coming.

Mr. RANDALL. In the judgment of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be giving a very large discretion to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was desirous of relieving the minds of gentlemen who are so very tender-hearted. Then I make the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent for absent members.

Mr. SPEER. In defense of the ruling of the Chair, I desire to say this——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled upon the point.

Mr. SPEER. In the last Congress, on the occasion of a call of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] being in the chair as Speaker pro tempore, the other side of the House put motion after motion to excuse absent members and called for the yeas and nays on those motions, and every such motion was entertained by the Speaker pro tempore and the yeas and nays allowed to be called.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The same point which arises here came up when the House was in continuous session for forty-six hours. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] being in the chair, the matter underwent considerable discussion, and an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair that excuses could be heard before the warrant issued. But that appeal was withdrawn, because the acting Speaker had issued the warrant, and therefore there was no need for the appeal. But it did seem to me then that if the other ruling was maintained, and if the excuses of absentees could be received here upon the floor, and motions made on those excuses, and the yeas and nays called, the proceeding, which is the vital proceeding in a call of the House, to wit, the summoning in of absent members to make a full House, may be so indefinitely postponed as to be entirely inoperative. But at that time the Gordian knot was cut by the acting Speaker ordering the warrant to issue.

Mr. SENER. But the order had been issued before the excuses had been offered.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the warrant should issue before excuses are made, the Speaker would have to issue his warrant for those who are absent by leave of the House, and hear their excuses afterward.

The SPEAKER. That would be no hardship, because if they were absent by leave of the House they would be excused afterward. Gentlemen will observe that if the Chair decides to entertain now a motion to excuse a member and the yeas and nays are called on that, that motion to excuse can be repeated upon every member who is absent, and the yeas and nays can be called on each motion. It would be, therefore, absolutely impossible to get a quorum for business.

Mr. WILBER. And then the motion to reconsider the vote upon the motion to excuse could be made.

The SPEAKER. It would be absolutely impossible to get a quorum for business; the call of the House would be entirely nugatory. The Chair, in looking at the decisions in the Journal of 1858, observes this practice, which has since been broken up by the House. Upon a motion to excuse a member another member rises and asks to be excused from voting on that motion, and the yeas and nays were called on that. Of course that is mere trifling with the object. It is the right of fifteen members, the very extreme limit in this case, to send for absentees. The number of members present must be less than fifteen before the power is lost to send for absentees. One-fifth can call for the yeas and nays. If there are fifteen members present, then three members can call for the yeas and nays on voting to excuse each one of a hundred or more absentees. The Constitution says that one-fifth of those present can call the yeas and nays. Then on excusing each member who is absent three members present could call the yeas and nays, and gentlemen can see the time that would be taken up. The Chair is putting the extreme case.

Mr. SPEER. Yes; very extreme.

The SPEAKER. But it shows the effect of the ruling which is asked upon excusing members now absent on this roll-call.

Mr. CESSNA. Suppose the warrant of the Speaker is now sent out for absentees; what business can be transacted, although we have a quorum present, or must we wait for the coming of the other members?

The SPEAKER. That the Chair is not commenting upon. The rule says further on:

The order of arrest is not usually made by the House unless a quorum cannot otherwise be obtained; and upon the appearance of a quorum, a motion is usually made and carried that "all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with;" and this motion is held to be in order at any period of the proceedings.

Mr. SPEER. Is not that motion now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because it was the last motion decided by the House. The Chair thinks, therefore, that a ruling of the kind which was made during the speakership of Mr. Orr—and the Chair does not ever like to overrule a decision by a previous Speaker—absolutely nullifies the power of the House to obtain a quorum. Beyond that there is no possible harm that can result to any member from this procedure; because if the Speaker's warrant goes out and finds a man unable to leave his house he is simply subpœnaed, he does not attend now but he comes into the House the next day, having disobeyed its warrant, and offers his excuse and would be excused.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the rule say that the warrant shall not issue except for those who are not excused?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not the rule.

Mr. SPEER. Will the Chair read that portion of the rule?

The SPEAKER. That portion of the rule is as follows:

The doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear.

They must be here, and if they do not give a good excuse they may be taken into custody.

Mr. TYNER. If the Chair is now trying to find a way out of a difficulty which is likely to occur, let us suppose that the warrant of the Speaker shall be issued and that the absentees shall be brought to the bar of the House before proceedings under the call are suspended, would it not then be competent to call the yeas and nays on the proposition to excuse each one of the absentees?

The SPEAKER. No; because it is in the power of the House at any time to dispense with further proceedings under the call by a single vote.

Mr. TYNER. Suppose that the House shall not do it?

The SPEAKER. O, of course if the majority of the House shall choose to tangle itself up it can. But the way out is clear if the House shall choose to take it. The rule says that the order of arrest is not usually made by the House unless a quorum cannot otherwise be obtained, and upon the appearance of a quorum the motion is usually made and carried that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The Chair has never known absentees to be sent for when a quorum is present.

Mr. TYNER. The vote which has been taken, and which has been determined by a majority of the House, indicates that the House is not willing to dispense with proceedings under the call. Suppose that absentees are brought to the bar of the House; no one of them would be entitled to vote upon dispensing with further proceedings under the call until he shall be excused by the House for being absent.

The SPEAKER. He would be entitled to vote when excused by the House or when the proceedings under the call are dispensed with, one or the other.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to this fact: Here we are proceeding in this way when there is an absolute quorum present, and it is because a minority of the members here refuse to vote.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman is going to make any remarks, I ask leave to reply to them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am content with what I have said.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that the reason why we are here and did not vote was that we have thrown no obstructions in the way of nor have we asked any delay in time on any appropriation bill; that this morning when we came here we did not call for the usual time for general debate on the sundry civil bill; on the contrary, when we were offered one hour for general debate with a view to hasten the business of the House we took but fifteen minutes. We subsequently did not demand the first reading of the appropriation bill as we had a right to do, and we came here to-night under a distinct pledge made by the republican side of the House that the House would go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil bill on the meeting of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know of no such pledge.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Does the gentleman think as Representatives we have no other business than to vote money out of the Treasury?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then we are able to do only such things as you want us to do.

Mr. RANDALL. No; you are able to do such things as you may in honor do.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a question of order. In order to give the House control over its own business and settle a precedent, if you please, as the rule is not certain on the point, is it not in order to move that pending the call of the House no excuses shall be in order?

Mr. SPEER. That would be a change of the rule.

Mr. FINCK. The rule reads plainly, and there can be no misconstruction of it. It is that—

Upon calls of the House, the names of the members shall be called over (alphabetically) by the Clerk, and the absentees noted. After which the names of the absentees shall again be called over. The doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

Now, then, the very next thing after the doors are shut is, what? It is that the roll shall be called for excuses. But the rule says:

The doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. It does not state at what time excuses shall and can be offered.

Mr. FINCK. Certainly not; but it follows immediately after the order for the closing of the doors, and it has always been the rule of a court that a witness about to be attached has a right to have the reasons stated why he was not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been present at a great many calls, but he scarcely remembers a case in which when a quorum was present the hearing of excuses has been made the subject of delay in the business of the House.

Mr. WHEELER, (at five minutes past twelve o'clock a. m.) If the night is going to be frittered away and we are to be incapacitated from performing the business of the country, I propose to move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 81, noes 80.

Several members called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Pending that motion, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to move that the House take a recess until seven o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that pending a call of the House all motions are out of order except a motion to adjourn or to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The rule is quite positive on that point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is only when there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know any distinction in such matters during a call of the House.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—yeas 95, nays 115, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Finck, Foster, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sloss, William A. Smith, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Marcus L. Ward William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—77.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. LAMAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry which I think is a good one, and I desire to say a word upon it. Am I right in the statement that to-day the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill, made a motion that the House do now take a recess until half past seven o'clock for the purpose of taking up the sundry civil appropriation bill and considering it? Am I right in making that statement? I think I am. No gentleman I think will controvert that statement. Now, the inquiry I make is this: As the House voted in favor of that motion, is it not tantamount to an order of the House that such should be its procedure when it met again at the designated hour?

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say a word in regard to that question.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish my inquiry answered, for I have another one to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan desires to say a word.

Mr. CONGER. I stood by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when he made his motion; I was within two seats from him, I think.

Mr. LAMAR. I submit that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ought himself to state what his motion was.

Mr. CONGER. Let me make my statement.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to submit the point that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] could not make such a motion as has been stated.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I would like to know whether these are "parliamentary inquiries?"

Mr. CONGER. Among a large number of republicans on this side of the House it was agreed that we should take a recess and have a session to-night to take up this bill in regard to southern affairs.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What right had you to conspire in that way?

Mr. CESSNA. And it was with that understanding that a large number of gentlemen on this side voted for the recess.

Mr. LAMAR. I insist on an answer to my inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. When the gentleman from Ohio made his motion for a recess, he added in a low voice, (which I heard, because I was close by him, but which I venture to say was not heard five seats distant from me,) "For the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill."

Mr. KELLOGG. I heard that remark, and I was in the center of the Hall, at my seat.

Mr. WILBER. That was not five seats off.

Mr. GARFIELD. In view of what has been said, I wish to make a statement.

Mr. CONGER. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, I wish to add a word. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] in charge of the bill reported by the Alabama committee, moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio so that the session of this evening should be for the purpose of considering that bill. The Speaker decided that that was not a proper amendment to the motion to take a recess. Therefore we could not have had the voice of the House as to the object of the meeting this evening, for that motion was not entertained.

Mr. CESSNA. As a question of fact I submit this inquiry to the Chair: this morning when we were discussing this question did I not submit to the Chair this question of order—that if we went into the Committee of the Whole this morning and gave the day to the appropriation bill the evening session could be devoted to the consideration of the bill in regard to southern affairs? I submitted that parliamentary inquiry to the Chair—if we devoted the day session to the consideration of the appropriation bill and then ordered a recess at or about five o'clock whether at the evening session it would not be in order to raise the question of consideration so that the majority of the House could determine whether they would take up the appropriation bill or the bill in regard to affairs in the South, and the Chair answered that inquiry by saying, "the Chair knows nothing to prohibit it."

Mr. GARFIELD. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] has just stated did certainly occur. It was a parliamentary inquiry that he made; but no notice that I heard was given at any time——

Mr. CESSNA. Any gentleman must be very thick-headed who did not understand that notice.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not standing here to be insulted by the gentleman in this sort of way.

Mr. CESSNA. I do not insult anybody.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order. Unless he can address members respectfully I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. CESSNA. I addressed the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I heard every word that the gentleman uttered this morning; and there was no notification whatever, at least so far as I heard, of a purpose to call that matter up. The gentleman simply made an inquiry as to what would be in order. After that inquiry was made my motion to go into Committee of the Whole prevailed. A number of gentlemen during the day consulted with me whether we had better have an evening session or sit until six o'clock. I consulted with the Speaker; I consulted with half a dozen members to ascertain their judgment as to which proceeding would probably accomplish most work.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is this going on by unanimous consent? If so, I object. I want to go to business.

Mr. LAMAR. I insist that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts will hardly cut me off in this way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I withdraw my objection; but I do not want to sit up at night to listen to this sort of discussion.

A MEMBER. Then go to bed.

Mr. GARFIELD. After consulting with various gentlemen I finally concluded that at about five o'clock we would take a recess until half past seven o'clock. When the time arrived, I moved that the committee rise; and when the committee had risen, I then addressed the Speaker, moving that we take a recess until half past seven o'clock for the purpose of going on with the sundry civil appropriation bill. I said it in my ordinary voice, and I did not know at that time there was any purpose on the part of anybody to do anything else. That was the understanding of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with whom I consulted about how much time we should gain if we sat till six o'clock instead of having an evening session. I came and made my motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to say a word. Let the other side be heard.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of order, and that is if I am to be kept here to-night I insist that the rule shall be strictly enforced against smoking in the Hall—strictly enforced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana insists on the rule being strictly enforced which prohibits smoking in the Hall. The Doorkeeper will see that the rule is enforced.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire by leave of the House to say a word about my course. The gentleman from Ohio has given his. This is it. Here we have passed the Army appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, the West Point Academy appropriation bill, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and I thought the country could get along without the sundry civil appropriation bill better than the country could allow this Congress to adjourn and let the state of disorder in the South go on. And that being so, and knowing that the next Congress would pass the appropriation bills and would not pass this bill we have got before us, I thought it to be my duty, as a friend of the country, as the friend of the loyal men North and South, we should pass this bill rather than pass the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not object to the gentleman's making a statement, but I do object to his entering upon an argument.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am making my statement, not making an argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] offers the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay that resolution upon the table.

Mr. NIBLACK. Pending that motion I offer as an excuse for my colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, that he is detained from his seat by illness, and I move that he be excused. I insist upon a ruling on my motion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. On the motion to lay on the table I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before the ruling of the Chair is had on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, I ask, as I have never obtruded my views in these discussions on points of order, to say a word or two in reference to this particular parliamentary law.

Mr. MOREY. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Indiana has been recognized to make that motion pending the motion to lay the resolution upon the table?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. MOREY. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. When we undertake to construe a law, whether a statute or parliamentary rule, we must look to the circumstances which surrounded the parties at the time the law or rule was adopted for its true construction. Now, what was the condition of the country at the time this rule became the parliamentary law of the land? We had no telegraphs then by which to summon a man in California in the twinkling of an eye, like a flash of lightning. We had no railroads then which would enable members to come rapidly to this city from any part of the Union. Hence the necessity for hearing excuses for the absence of members before issuing the warrant of the Speaker for their arrest; otherwise a member being absent who had a good excuse might be brought here from a long distance at the peril of his life, when if the excuse which he had was heard his arrest would not have been ordered.

Mr. MOREY. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion, and move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. There is a large number of gentlemen on the outside who wish to come in.

Mr. SPEER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 66, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Curtis, Darrall, Donnan, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hynes, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Rainey, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stephens, Stowell, Sypher, Taylor, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Waldron, Walls, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Wiliams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Danford, Davis, DeWitt, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Ransier, Read, Robbins, Southard, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barber, Bass, Beck, Buffinton, Bundy, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Crounse, Crutchfield, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harrison, Hathorn, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Merriam, Mitchell, Morey, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, Orth, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sloss, Small, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Marcus L. Ward, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—88.

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the report of the Committee on Affairs in Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] rises to a privileged question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] rises to a privileged motion; which necessarily takes precedence.

Mr. RANDALL. Which is to reconsider the vote by which the House voted to disperse with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. COBURN. My object is to have the House consider the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. RANDALL. And my object is to proceed with the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] necessarily takes precedence.

Mr. PIERCE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and pending that it is moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to submit to the Chair this point of order: The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has already moved to reconsider the vote to dispense with further proceedings under the call, and then a motion was made to adjourn, and was voted down. Then a vote was taken on the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the result was that no quorum voted. We are now at the same position again.

The SPEAKER. At what position are we now?

Mr. CESSNA. At the same position as when we voted awhile ago and had no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The proposition now pending is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to dismiss all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CESSNA. I understood the Chair to decide that that motion had been carried.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to raise the point of order that the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call is not subject to a motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call is one of those motions which in its very nature exhausts itself at once. If further proceedings are dispensed with, the House resumes its business. If a motion to reconsider can be made, it can be brought up at any time within the period fixed by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is not debatable, and in this case, if to be made at all, must be instantly made. The Chair will suppose this state of facts: The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to dispense with proceedings under the call, stating that enough members have arrived to make a quorum. But suppose he found that he had been under a misapprehension as to that, would he not be entitled to move a reconsideration?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose the House had adjourned by that time?

The SPEAKER. That of course would cut off all motions.

Mr. CESSNA. Let me suggest that a new motion for a call of the House might be made at any time, whether it was in order to reconsider or not.

The SPEAKER. That would involve both the motion for a call and the call of the House itself, and would take a great deal of time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There are a large number of motions which in their nature take effect and go into operation at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know any one of them that is not subject to reconsideration.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The motion to adjourn is not.

The SPEAKER. Because there is then no House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. A motion to amend, after the bill itself has been passed and gone from the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. Because that has been executed in the last motion, when the bill has been passed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I know it is fully executed. Now, I submit that dispensing with further proceedings under the call has at once put the House in a position for the resumption of other business. The doors are opened. Members have come in and members are entitled to take part in the proceedings by having come in in the mean time, in the very nature of things.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion under parliamentary law, that the Chair knows of, which, after the proper stage is passed, is liable to reconsideration. If this were passed by without a motion to reconsider, the Chair would acknowledge, of course, that it would become an accomplished fact. But the motion to reconsider is made instanter. Nothing has intervened.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There is the motion to take a recess after a recess has been had.

The SPEAKER. When the recess is taken there is no House left to deal with the question of reconsideration.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My point is this: A call of the House, while it is going on, confines the right to vote to the members who are then present. The doors are shut. No person can come in. It is not in strictness the act of the House itself. It is the act of a portion of the House, who, by the Constitution of the United States, are notified to compel the attendance of absent members. Now, when a motion to dispense with proceedings under the call has been adopted, the doors are instantly thrown open. Then other members come in and the House goes on with its business. It is just like the case of an adjournment or recess. The order has gone into operation and cannot be put back in the position which it was before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman a case which he remembers, without bringing up names. It occurred during a call of the House. During a vote on dismissing the proceedings it was found that a member of the House had evaded by leaving the House after the call was made; and if the call had been dismissed and there had been no power to reconsider, it would have put it beyond the power of the House to take cognizance of that offense.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That was a gross contempt of the House, and the House could have taken cognizance of it at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It might hang upon a motion of reconsideration whether the House could take cognizance of such an offense at all.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose a man struck the Speaker or one of the officers of the House, could he not be punished for contempt of the House?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter in no wise connected with a call of the House; this was an offense under and connected with a call of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I remember the case to which the Chair refers, and I believe that in that case I myself moved a vote of censure on the offending member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not rule this motion out.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make another point of order. We have had at least two dilatory motions made to obstruct the report of the gentleman from Indiana, and this is manifestly a dilatory motion. We found ourselves without a quorum and a call of the House was ordered, which was not a dilatory motion, of course, because it was necessary, there being no quorum present. After a quorum was secured, the House dispensed with all further proceedings under the call; and this motion manifestly, as the Chair must see, is another dilatory motion in contravention of the rules of the House in that regard.

Mr. PIERCE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the House should take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow, would it not be in a condition to complete this business?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. There would not be time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would not the session continue as long as the House chooses to sit?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, the legislative day would continue.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would it not continue to-morrow if we take a recess now?

The SPEAKER. Why, of course; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] has moved that the House adjourn.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn; and on a division there were—ayes 69, noes 85.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-one members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 120, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Danford, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hoskins, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, George Willard, Willie, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kellogg, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—120.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Buffinton, Bundy, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crutchfield, Davis, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Freeman, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hathorn, Havens, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Mitchell, Monroe, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, Orth, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Schell, Scofield, Sener, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloss, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—87.

So (at one o'clock and thirty-five minutes a. m., Thursday, February 25) the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to state that on this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, who, if present, would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. BUNDY, who was present and had voted, arose and withdrew his vote.

The question recurred upon laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House had agreed to dispense with further proceedings under the call; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 82, noes 42.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a quorum voting?

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers, then.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I call for the yeas and nays. We may as well order them at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being in the affirmative 25, one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. The inquiry is whether after the doors have been ordered to be closed in proceedings under a call of the House any member who was then outside has a right to come into the House?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to state that I am informed the member from Ohio, Mr. BUNDY, who has not been here until now, is now here and voting.

Mr. HYNES. Have not all proceedings under the call been dispensed with by order of the House?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will be required to withdraw.

The SPEAKER. No member of the House has a right to be here unless present when the doors were closed.

Mr. CONGER. Has not the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] been outside and come in again since the order to close the doors?

Mr. COX. He has a right to go out.

Mr. WOOD. We have our democratic friends outside who cannot obtain access, while those on the other side do obtain access. I am told that more than one upon the other side has been admitted, and none on this side has been admitted. If that is so, I desire that those members will be excluded.

The SPEAKER. It is not proper for any member to be here in the Hall who was not here when the doors were ordered to be closed under the call of the House.

Mr. CESSNA. Suppose that when the announcement was made by the Chair that further proceedings under the call were dispensed with——

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced no such thing.

Mr. CESSNA. The Chair announced that the motion was carried.

The SPEAKER. Very well; but the motion to reconsider that vote was made.

Mr. CESSNA. But suppose that when the Chair announced that the ayes had it, a gentleman entered the Hall before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The door would not be opened until the Chair directed it to be opened.

Mr. CESSNA. The door was opened.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper would not open the door until the Chair had so directed. No motion is complete until the discretion of the House to reconsider it has been exhausted.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Suppose that the motion to reconsider was not made until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If no motion is made to reconsider, the action of the House is complete.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The motion to reconsider can be made to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then I suppose that under the ruling of the Chair every gentleman who should come in between to-night and to-morrow——

The SPEAKER. If no reconsideration was moved, and the House proceeded to the consideration of other business, the doors would be instantly opened.

Mr. O'BRIEN. By order of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is no confusion about it.

Mr. CONGER. After the Chair announced the vote on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] obtained the floor and stated the character of the bill which he reported.

The SPEAKER. O, no.

Mr. CONGER. He did state it.

The SPEAKER. That might be; and there might be a great many things stated on the floor without the gentlemen so stating them having the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. Another gentleman obtained the floor for a motion of higher privilege.

The SPEAKER. Two could not have had it at the same time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. My colleague [Mr. COBURN] had the floor, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] rose to a motion of higher privilege.

The SPEAKER. No gentleman has the floor for a motion unless the Chair recognizes him as having the floor. If no motion of a higher privilege had been submitted, then the Chair would have recognized the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair pleases, the Chair himself stated the subject mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

The SPEAKER. Yes; in a colloquial way, as the Chair very often states propositions of gentlemen on the floor without their being recognized as entitled to make motions or submit propositions for the action of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to dispense with further proceedings under this call.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has said that some republican members have been let into the Hall and no democratic members have been let in, I desire to state that at the time the vote was passed to dispense with further proceedings under the call several gentlemen on both sides were let in without any wrong intention.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes there was no wrong intention about it.

Mr. WOOD. I insist upon my question of order that any member who has been admitted into the Hall since the doors were closed by order of the House shall be directed to withdraw.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Before that is decided I wish to ask whether this House has power to drive a member out of the Hall by force? I ask the Chair to rule on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that that question is raised. The point of the gentleman's inquiry was whether any gentleman not in the Hall when the call was ordered had the right to come in and remain here. The Chair sustained the point that a member in that situation had not such right. Now, the Chair does not suppose that any question of force follows from that decision.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to ask whether it was not necessary for a gentleman who had come into the Hall under such circumstances to leave it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not suppose that any gentleman in that position would wait to be forced out.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Suppose the member does not go out, what then?

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair but for the House to say what should be done.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then the question put by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] becomes very pertinent—can the House force such a member out, any more than compel these gentlemen to vote who sit in their seats and refuse to answer when the roll is called?

Mr. MAYNARD. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very object of a call of the House is to get men in, not to keep them out.

The SPEAKER. To get them in under the rules and according to law. The Clerk will call the roll.

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunter, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Cox, Morrison, and O'Brien—3.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, Orth, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Randall, Read, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Shanks, Sloan, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Storm, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Vance, Waddell, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, William Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—147.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CLEMENTS. On this question I am paired with my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ROBINSON, who if present would vote "no," while I should vote "ay."

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, has been called home by severe illness in his family.

The result was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be reopened.

Mr. RANDALL. Has a quorum voted?

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Several MEMBERS. That is not necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair hold that less than a quorum can decide this question?

The SPEAKER. There is no need of a quorum. Less than a quorum can agree to dispense with the proceedings under the call: and there cannot be any sort of doubt that the same vote is sufficient on reconsideration as on the direct question.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear the rule upon which the Chair states the first proposition, that less than a quorum can dispense with proceedings under a call.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a privileged question. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the suppression of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. Before that question is made should not the bill be presented at the desk and announced by the Chair?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Unless the bill is read we cannot tell what it is.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Should not the bill be read first?

Mr. RANDALL. I raised it before a word of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration on a bill is raised at the initial point for the very purpose of saving the time of the House, if the House so wishes. There have been bills of three hundred pages in length.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point that the last vote developed the want of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. That is no point, because there may be a quorum upon the next vote. The question of consideration, however, is in order. The question therefore is, Shall the bill be now considered?

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to raise this point under the resolution by which the report is sought to be made——

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have a right to state my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. HEREFORD. The point I raise is this, that by the resolution under which the committee seek to make this report (and I shall ask the Journal to be read) they were only authorized to ascertain certain facts in regard to the State of Alabama and to report those facts to this House. By that resolution they were not authorized to report by bill or otherwise in reference to the State of Alabama, much less to report in reference to all the States. This being a select committee, they have no right to go beyond that which was delegated to them by this House. By one of the rules of the House a standing committee has a right to report by bill or otherwise; but it is laid down in all authorities, by Cushing in his Manual, which if the House desires I will have read and they will see my point is plain, that a committee cannot go beyond the power delegated to it. A select committee certainly cannot go beyond the power delegated to it. Can this Alabama committee have the right under the power delegated to them to report a tariff bill to this body? Certainly not. They have no right to go beyond the power delegated to them. No committee can transcend the power given to it. It certainly cannot be upheld that this committee can report a measure including not Alabama alone but all the States.

The SPEAKER. Where a subject is submitted to a committee for investigation it always carries with it the remedial power. Take the case to which the gentleman himself has referred. The Ways and Means Committee are instructed to investigate certain matters connected with the Pacific Mail subsidy——

Mr. HEREFORD. But that is a regular committee.

The SPEAKER. Suppose they are not authorized in the resolution to report anything except the facts, still they may report sundry measures based on those facts. The gentleman makes the point that they could not report a tariff bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. But that is a standing committee.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference in their power.

Mr. RANDALL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair on that point.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing absolutely whatever in the point of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDALL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HEREFORD. Allow me to read from Cushing's Manual.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HEREFORD. I propose now to read from Cushing's Manual as to the power of committees.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Is it in order to discuss a point after it has been decided by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia if he has an authority on the subject. The Chair is always indulgent on points of order, as they are criticisms upon his own conduct.

Mr. HEREFORD. I read the following from Cushing's Manual as to the power of committees:

These rules are founded in the clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law, that a committee is bound by and is not at liberty to depart from the order of reference; a principle which is essential to the regular dispatch of business; for if it were admitted, that what the House entertained in one instance, and referred to a committee, was so far controllable by that committee that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end; and as often as circumstances should afford a pretense, the proceedings of the House would be involved in endless confusion and contests with itself.

The SPEAKER. The rule means exactly what the gentleman from West Virginia states, that the Select Committee on Alabama Affairs could not be allowed to report a tariff bill. Nor could the Committee on Louisiana report the Pacific Mail subsidy, nor the Committee on the Public Lands be allowed to bring in an appropriation for the continuance of public buildings. It means simply that each committee should be kept within the purview of its own powers. When the House organized the committee to examine into the affairs of Alabama they did not send it as a mere matter of curiosity to find certain facts.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand this is a bill covering the whole United States.

The SPEAKER. But it covers Alabama inclusively.

Mr. RANDALL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and call for the reading of the resolution under which the committee was appointed.

Mr. TYNER. Does not the RECORD show that the bill has been twice read?

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Indiana reported the bill the other evening, he did so with the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to raise this point reserved; so that the point was made in time if it had validity. The reserved right was held by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make this point. The Chair holds that the committee have full authority to make the report.

Mr. RANDALL. And from that decision I appeal, and I ask that the resolution shall be read.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BROMBERG. I call for the reading of the resolution under which the committee has acted.

The SPEAKER. Although what the gentleman from West Virginia insists on is entirely omitted, the Chair knows what the resolution contains.

Mr. BROMBERG. But the House has to vote on the appeal, and in order to form its judgment it ought to hear the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, at the recent election for Representatives to Congress in the State of Alabama and during the canvass which preceded said election, Federal soldiers were stationed in several counties in said State by order of the President of the United States; and whereas information had been received by the President that intimidation and threats, violence, murder, and assassination had been resorted to in said State for the purpose of preventing electors from voting; and whereas these allegations have been denied by a portion of the press of Alabama and correspondents of northern newspapers, and it has been stated by them that there was no intimidation or threat or violence of any kind for the purpose of deterring or influencing voters at such election, and it has been charged by them that said troops were sent to Alabama to intimidate and overawe electors, and prevent the free exercise of suffrage by such at said election: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to go to Alabama to take testimony and investigate said charges and counter charges, and to report the same to the House of Representatives; and that said committee be empowered to inquire into all the facts relative thereto, and particularly to investigate and inquire whether any murders or assassinations or any other acts of violence were committed in said State at said election or while the contest for the same was pending; if so, by whom and upon whom committed, where and at what time; what were the known or supposed political sentiments of the parties respectively, and the motives which influenced them; to ascertain whether any means or efforts were used to constrain suffrage, or whether peaceable and legal assemblies were interrupted or disturbed by armed forces or by violence in said State, and to inquire and ascertain whether the Federal soldiers interfered with or in any manner whatever attempted to interfere with the free exercise of suffrage during said election, and to report the same to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and tender oaths to any one examined before or by them, to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to report at any time.

Mr. HEREFORD. The committee was only to report those facts.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word. On the absence of any resolution directing this report and on the face of the resolution itself, which gives no authority to report at any time, I base my appeal.

Mr. CONGER. And I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. How many dilatory motions are to be entertained?

The SPEAKER. The rules prohibit more than two being entertained on any question.

Mr. MAYNARD. How many have we had to-night.

The SPEAKER. Not more than two on any one question.

Mr. HEREFORD. The dilatory proceedings have been on the other side. We were in the midst of an appropriation bill when these proceedings commenced.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were ayes 43.

Before the negative vote was taken,

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

Mr. NEGLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 134, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Smith, Southard, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to lay on the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] from the decision of the Chair.

The question being taken, there were ayes 96.

Before the negative vote was announced

The SPEAKER said: The Chair will direct the vote to be taken by tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 2.

Mr. CONGER. There is a quorum in the Hall.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. The appeal was the last question voted on.

The SPEAKER. It is the same question now precisely.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will reserve that shot for another time.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. CONGER to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Speaker taken by Mr. RANDALL; and there were—yeas 142, nays 0, not voting 145; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. During the roll-call the following proceedings took place:

When the name of Mr. BLAND was called and he failed to vote,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND, is in his seat and I insist that he vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot interrupt the roll-call for any purpose.

Mr. SMART. Mr. EAMES, of Rhode Island, is paired upon this question with Mr. SLOSS, of Alabama. If Mr. EAMES were present he would vote "ay," and Mr. SLOSS would vote "no."

Mr. CESSNA. On this question my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, is paired with Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. If Mr. O'NEILL were present he would vote "ay," and if Mr. HAMILTON were present, I presume he would not vote at all.

The call of the roll having been completed,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: When the name of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND, was called he was in his seat and did not vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet announced the vote.

Mr. CLEMENTS. But before the vote is announced I wish to make this point. I stated at the time the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was in his seat and had not been excused from voting. The gentleman is yet in his seat, and I now insist that he vote.

Mr. BLAND. I will vote on an appropriation bill or any other bill that is worth voting on.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the names of those gentlemen who have not voted be now called.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope they will have an opportunity of voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that his motion would be equally in order on any roll-call in the House on any day.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Certainly; and if it is, it is in order now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the roll-call should proceed without interruption, and that the result should be announced before any action can be taken on non-voting. It will be just as much in order after the result is announced as before.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire the Chair to hear me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman; but it is a very exceptional proceeding.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The Constitution provides that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

Now the purpose of that is, as a matter of course, to procure a quorum; that is the object of it. Then the rules provide that every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him, and he must be excused before the commencement of the roll-call. Now, it seems to me that this constitutional provision was made not only for the purpose of compelling the attendance of members here, but also for the purpose of putting it in the power of the House to compel members to do their duty.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the obligation to vote which is upon every member is upon him as absolutely at one time as at another. It does not depend on the number that may vote upon a roll-call; the obligation to vote is without condition or restriction. If the proceeding that the gentleman now states he desires to have taken will be in order, it could be made upon every roll-call, and it would be a form of dilatory proceedings in the House daily which would obstruct all legislation.

Mr. CESSNA. Before this vote is announced, I desire to submit an inquiry to the Chair.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The failure of gentlemen to vote when their names are called is an obstruction of business.

A MEMBER. Your points of order are an obstruction of business.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It operates no more strongly one way than another. If the ruling of the Chair is a correct ruling, then it is always in the power of gentlemen to obstruct business by simply omitting to record their votes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the roll-call proceeded without interruption, and the result is to be announced.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to suggest this point to the Chair: of what avail is it to compel the attendance of members here, if there is no power in the House to compel them to vote after they have been brought here?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not pretend to place a limit upon what the House may adjudge as a punishment for that offense. The Chair is only at this point maintaining that it is not competent for him to allow the roll-call to be interrupted for such a purpose, although he is now indulging it, owing to the irregularity of the proceedings. The roll-call must go through to its legitimate conclusion. If the Chair should rule as the gentleman suggests, then any roll-call could be interrupted and no business could be transacted.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order; which is the announcement of the result of the vote.

Mr. CESSNA. Before the vote is announced, I rise to a question of privilege. I heard the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] vote in answer to the call of his name. I want to know whether his vote has not been withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I heard another gentleman go to him and say, "What did you vote for? We do not want to vote."

Mr. RANDALL. Eavesdroppers never hear any good of themselves.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will again state what I stated a moment ago, that during the call of the roll the member from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was in his seat and declined to vote. The roll-call is now completed; he yet remains in his seat. I ask as a member of the House that he be called upon to vote on this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that if the Chair allows the roll-call to be interfered with for this purpose he must necessarily entertain such a motion every day and in regard to every gentleman who may not vote. Suppose that to-morrow in the transaction of business the roll is called.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Then I ask the Chair what recourse has the House in such a case? And for that purpose I call the attention of the Chair to the thirty-first and sixty-first rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not need to be reminded of the rules of the House. The duty of each gentleman here to vote is absolute. As to the mode of enforcing that duty there is no rule that points it out. The House may censure the gentleman for not voting, or if it choose the House may expel him.

Mr. CLEMENTS. That is what I am driving at.

Mr. COX. How can you do that without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to find out.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. I make this point of order, that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] as I understand, answered to his name on the roll-call.

The SPEAKER. And his vote is recorded.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that it was not.

The SPEAKER. It is. The Chair apologizes to the House for entertaining this interruption, for it is wholly irregular, and it would be a very bad precedent. No gentleman who is in his seat is entitled to know the fact on which this proceeds. The rules of the House absolutely forbid that a gentleman shall be near the Clerk's desk while the tally is going on. No gentleman is presumed to know what the vote is. No gentleman is presumed to know until the vote is announced whether a quorum has voted or not.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do know, for I listened.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the gentleman does not so know in any manner that authorizes him to take official cognizance of it.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have the evidence of my ears, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, they are very large.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Large or small, they are sufficient to enable me to know the fact upon this point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gives notice that during the few remaining days that he is to occupy the position of Speaker he will under no circumstances entertain an interruption of the roll-call On this question—in which the Chair begs leave to remind the House he is as much interested as any other member can possibly be—on the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair the yeas are 142, noes none given.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. DONNAN. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Is the declared vote the only means by which a quorum can be determined when it is within the cognizance of every man here, the Speaker included, that there is within the Hall a sufficient number of members who have not voted to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] any practicable mode in which his point can be enforced.

Mr. DONNAN. Is it not within the power of the Speaker, he having cognizance of the fact, to declare that a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER. But the Speaker's declaration will not make members answer "ay" or "no."

Mr. RANDALL. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman raises the question that business is proceeding without the presence of a quorum, it is within the competence of the Chair to decide that a quorum is present; and he will not allow the business of the House to be interrupted by any dilatory proceeding. He assumes the responsibility for that purpose of declaring that a quorum is present, because no business can proceed without a quorum. Even a gentleman speaking is entitled to have a quorum present. If the point be raised, a gentleman addressing the Chair may be taken off the floor by any member raising the point that no quorum is present. The question being so raised, the Chair, according to his judgment and on his responsibility, can rule that a quorum is present. But when the roll-call is resorted to, that is the last made of certification, from which there is no appeal. Now that the rules absolutely require gentlemen to vote is undeniable; but how the gentleman from Missouri, on whom the point has been made, can be compelled to stand up and pronounce his vote "ay" or "no" the Chair does not know.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged question. I send to the desk a resolution which is privileged.

Mr. RANDALL. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] taking cognizance of the fact that no quorum has voted, moves a call of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the call to hear the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, having been within the bar of the House and in his seat and having refused to answer to his name when called by the Clerk of the House on a division by yeas and nays ordered by the House—

Ordered, That said SAMUEL J RANDALL be forthwith taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms and brought to the bar of the House to show cause and excuse, if any he has, why he should not be dealt with for disobedience of the rules of the House and contempt of its authority.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. This is a second contempt of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I make the point that no quorum being present, the House cannot entertain any business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] makes the point that no quorum being present it is not competent to entertain business.

Mr. O'BRIEN. And I insist on that point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I answer that as there appears to be a person present who on the roll-call is not shown to be present, he may under the rule be taken into custody if only fifteen members be here.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts does not present this resolution under that form of proceeding. That would come under the head of proceedings to enforce the attendance of absentees.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This gentleman is absent so far as regards making a quorum. He cannot be here for one purpose and absent for another.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I insist that my point is well taken, and I ask the decision of the Chair upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Here is a man who does not pretend to be present making a proposition.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I demand that the Chair determine the point I make that there is no quorum in the Hall at this moment. I move a call of the House to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, as some business has intervened, and as some members may have come in, I call upon the Speaker to declare the presence of a quorum, if he believes there is a quorum in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot declare a quorum against a yea and nay vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Some business has intervened and some men have come in.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You have seen this gentleman here, for he moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I voted and am recorded, and I have the right to demand the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not say a word about you.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no quorum present, and the gentleman's resolution cannot be received.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do not interfere with another man's rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe it will never be permissible for the Chair to obtrude his judgment against a roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not ask that. This is subsequent to the roll-call, other business having intervened.

The SPEAKER. What business?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A motion to adjourn and other business.

The SPEAKER. There has been no intervening business. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered a resolution, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania interjected a motion without recognition to lay upon the table. There has been no business intervening. The gentleman's resolution is the business upon which the point of order is raised.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I understand the rule, this is considered to be other business.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is raised on this very business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I understand the point of order, it cannot be sustained, for making a motion is other business and gives a chance for a new motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that gives a right to make a motion to adjourn, but it does not give a right to entertain this resolution, because the rule is explicit; when upon a roll-call the House shall find itself without a quorum, but two things are in order: one is to have a call of the House and the other is to move to adjourn. The business which the gentleman presents cannot be entertained if the point of order be made against it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He made a motion directly in the Speaker's presence. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made a motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What, not hear the gentleman move there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. He withdrew it, but the motion that there be a call of the House would be in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He ought not to be recognized as not present and then be allowed to make a motion.

Mr. COX. What is the business before the House now?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With his presence and that of the chairman it makes a quorum. The chairman knows the Chair is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair knows Mr. RANDALL is present, and that makes two, and that makes a quorum.

The SPEAKER. But how does the Chair know that some one of the one hundred and forty-two members who voted has not gone out?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He must judge for himself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman sees the utter absurdity, if he will excuse the expression, of the Chair putting an opinion in against a record on the roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair has his own eyes and is here and he knows, as well as he knows he is standing, there are more than one hundred and forty-two men here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is rigidly bound by the rules of the House.

Mr. MOREY. If he is bound by the record, then the presumption is that no one has gone out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The presumption is that no one has gone out, and he knows there are two present who are not recorded on this roll-call.

The SPEAKER. He only knows there are one hundred and forty-two present.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There were half an hour ago.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order. The Chair has decided the question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that gentlemen occupying the area in front of the Chair shall take their seats, so we may know what is going on.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The point of order having been raised and overruled, I demand that gentlemen shall take their seats, so we may proceed with the regular order. I move thereby a call of the House.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a point of order. It is simply as to the manner of making a record of members present. One way of making the record is to have the roll called and the names of members marked as present upon the roll-call, whether upon the yeas and nays or on a call of the House. That makes the record; but there is another way in which the House can make its record as positively, as absolutely, as undeniably as that, and that is by a member rising in his place and saying there is present another member who has not answered to his name, mentioning his name to the House, and asking that it be recorded. The record can be made and that man is present and voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard of that being done. He begs to remind the House, whereas that might and doubtless would be true, that there is a quorum in the Hall, the very principle enunciated by the gentleman from Indiana has been the foundation probably for the greatest legislation frauds ever committed.

Where a quorum, in the judgment of the Chair, has been declared to be present in the House against the result of a roll-call, these proceedings in the different Legislatures have brought scandal on their name.

Mr. COBURN. It would be a record made by the House.

The SPEAKER. There can be no record like the call of the yeas and nays; and from that there is no appeal. The moment you clothe your Speaker with power to go behind your roll-call and assume that there is a quorum in the Hall, why, gentlemen, you stand on the very brink of a volcano.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. When, on a call of the roll, a gentleman's name is called, and he fails to answer, after the roll-call is completed, any other member may call attention to the fact that that member is in his seat and has not voted.

The SPEAKER. That would be wholly irregular. The certification of the roll-call admits of no appeal from it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then what is the meaning of the rule that the member shall answer to his name?

The SPEAKER. That it is his duty to do it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then may I not say, "Here is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] if you please; he is in his seat and refuses to answer; I ask that his name be called?"

The SPEAKER. Under what rule?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I may designate him under the rule. Suppose he declines to answer? Then I ask to have his name called, and the Speaker directs the Clerk to call his name. If he refuses, I may offer a resolution, or any other member, that he be punished for contempt.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Not if there is not a quorum.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not think it matters whether there is a quorum or not.

The SPEAKER. The roll has been called and it has disclosed the presence of 142 members.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But suppose the roll-call had disclosed the presence of 200 members, I have the right and every other member has the right to demand that every member present shall vote.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair denies that utterly. If that were the case the House could do no business. The House would be a mere mob if that could be entertained.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to make a suggestion. If that were allowed every time the House voted on a bill that question might be raised again and again.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Shall we say then that a minority of the House may remain present without voting and that there is no way to compel them to vote?

The SPEAKER. A majority of the House of Representatives can transact any business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask leave to make this suggestion: Let me call the attention of the Speaker to an authority. After the motion was made to dispense with the call of the House, and the vote was taken, that vote showed there was not a quorum present. Immediately afterward the Speaker recognized the gentleman from Indiana, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and when no intervening business had been adjudicated——

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair stop the gentleman right there. No gentleman made the point; and if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] had not made the point in this instance, the Chair would not have interrupted the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Besides, the point on that motion would have been entirely different from this, for that did not require a quorum to decide it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, less than a quorum punishes, when there is a call of the House, by causing the arrest of the absent members and bringing them here in custody.

The SPEAKER. By a special rule there must be a call of the House to warrant that.

Mr. TYNER. Will the Chair pardon me for a single suggestion? When the vote was taken by which the House suspended all further proceedings under the call, that vote showed the absence of a quorum. Immediately afterward the gentleman from Indiana rose and made the report from his committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] at once called the attention of the Chair to the fact that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard the point made. It was matter of conversation between the Chair and the journal clerk that the point had not been made. He thought it rather strange that it had not been. The journal clerk just certifies the Chair that it was a matter of conversation between us, that the point had not been made.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose the point had been made. Suppose that fifteen men under a call of the House had shut the door. Suppose a motion carried to dispense with further proceedings under the call and a motion to reconsider made, which the Chair has held to be in order, and a motion to lay that on the table—the doors being shut all the time and the House waiting outside. Now, when the House comes in, on opening the doors, can the point be made that a quorum was not present at the last roll-call?

The SPEAKER. That strengthens the point, for this reason: That where a motion was pending that requires no quorum to settle it the point could not be raised, as it can be in regard to a motion that does require a quorum.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would inquire if we lacked a quorum on the last roll-call?

The SPEAKER. On the roll-call there were 142 members answering to their names. The Chair begs to state that no gentleman has, under the rules, made to him any suggestion whatever as to the mode of forcing the minority to respond to their names.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I tried to punish one of them, and you would not let me do it.

Mr. CONGER, (at three o'clock and thirty minutes a. m., Thursday, February 25.) I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope that there will be a call of the House; and let us bring all the laggards of our party here.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion that there now be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Albert, Bass, Beck, Buffinton, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crutchfield, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale Hamilton, Hathorn, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, Alexander S. McDill, Mitchell, Monroe, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Ransier, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The roll-call shows the presence of two hundred and fourteen members.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. CESSNA. I move that the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that strictly speaking the proceedings under the call take precedence before the motion to dispense with the proceedings can be strictly in order. The Chair was addressed about the same time by two gentlemen. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CESSNA. And my motion is that the Speaker issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms directing him to bring the absentees to the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the left of the Chair, [Mr. CESSNA.]

Mr. NIBLACK. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 43 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 45, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Buckner, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Danford, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Gunter, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Moore, Morey, Niles, O'Brien, Orr, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, St. John, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—139.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Burchard, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Durham, Finck, Glover, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Herndon, Hunton, Lamar, Milliken, Morrison, Neal, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Southard, Standiford, Stone, Vance, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Willie, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Atkins, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bright, Buffinton, Caldwell, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Hathorn, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hodges, Holman, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McLean, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Page, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—103.

So the motion of Mr. CESSNA was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a privileged motion, and move to reconsider the vote by which the House directed the Speaker to issue his warrant to bring in the absentees.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to lay that motion on the table, and on it call the yeas and nays; for we may as well have them at once and be done with them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HURLBUT. I rise to a question of order. Is the motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER. Pending a call of the House, if a quorum appears not to be present, only two motions are in order; one to adjourn and the other to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We are proceeding under the call now, are we not?

Mr. HURLBUT. The record shows that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. That does not take away the right to move to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. It would rather facilitate it.

The SPEAKER. It does not affect it at all, one way or the other.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 45 members voting therefor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to have the new rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motions of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn; but the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless two-thirds of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or the property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CONGER. Has not a motion to adjourn been voted on since any other business has intervened?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I go further back than that. The question under consideration is the consideration of the bill before the House. Now, then, there has been one motion to adjourn made.

The SPEAKER. But there is another question before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then what an excellent rule that is to cut off dilatory motions.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit that the question is this: A bill has been presented and the question is whether it shall be received, and that question is now pending and undecided.

The SPEAKER. But this question of a call of the House has supervened because of the fact that no quorum answered on the roll-call.

Mr. CONGER. Has there not been a motion to adjourn made since the last motion of a different character was made?

The SPEAKER. There has not, or the Chair would not entertain the motion.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House now adjourns will not the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, in the legislative day, be the consideration of the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN?]

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask a parliamentary question also. Would not the bill go over to-morrow unless two-thirds of the members present should second the previous question?

The SPEAKER. As it now stands, the question being of consideration, it would have to go over to the next morning.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And until such time as the filibustering on that day would permit it to be considered.

The SPEAKER. A majority of the House can dispose of it on that day without dilatory motions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But it has not been considered to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as it stands now it goes over as unfinished business, if the House adjourns now. As soon as the Journal is read to-morrow, it comes up with the pending question on its consideration. If the House should vote to consider it, then it would during that day require a two-thirds vote of the House to second the previous question upon it; but the next day a majority of the House could dispose of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With the exception of one motion to adjourn and one motion to adjourn to a particular day and such sitting still in their seats as gentlemen on the other side of the House choose to indulge in.

The SPEAKER. If there is not a majority of the House, the question cannot be settled.

Mr. RANDALL. I never knew any less than a majority of the House to pass a bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the great trouble, that it requires a majority of the House to do it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The majority of the House are for the bill when we can get them here. We propose to send for those who are absent. We can get them here by breakfast-time.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to submit a point to the Chair. An adjournment will bring about a new legislative day, and then, though this bill may come up immediately after the reading of the Journal as unfinished business, yet that new day being one upon which the rules may be suspended, would not any motion to suspend the rules or any other privileged motion take precedence of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because this motion is made under a suspension of the rules; and while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules, the pending business cannot be displaced by a new motion to suspend the rules. This point the Chair has already twice stated.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot see that we gain anything by an adjournment.

A MEMBER. We gain several hours' sleep.

Mr. CONGER. We shall have to go over the same ground again on another day. The same motions that prevent our coming to a vote to-day will prevent our coming to a vote to-morrow.

The SPEAKER That is true unless a majority of the House are for the bill.

Mr. CONGER. There is a majority of the House in favor of the bill whenever we can get a vote on the question.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. We have a Sergeant-at-Arms who can bring in the absentees.

Mr. O'BRIEN. He has gone to sleep.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. We will wake him up.

A MEMBER. He has not gone to sleep.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He is going after these people who sleep that the negro may be murdered.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I would like to ask the Chair what was the object of the new rule which the House adopted a few weeks ago?

The SPEAKER. The object was to give a majority of the House the right to prevent dilatory motions.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask whether that was successful.

The SPEAKER. There has not been a majority of the House here to-night in control of the business. The rule is entirely successful if the majority desires to enforce it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The trouble has been to control the minority—to make them stay in their seats and vote.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House adjourn; and there were—yeas 70, nays 123, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, Schell, Sener, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hynes, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Orr, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—123.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Buffinton, Burchard, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Creamer, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, Duell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hathorn, Hendee, Herndon, George F. Hoar, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Nesmith, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Page, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Sherwood, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—94.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: On this question I am paired with my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should undoubtedly vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; the motion on which the yeas and nays were ordered was the motion to reconsider the resolution directing you to issue your warrant.

The SPEAKER. The question is really on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand the Speaker to hold that now, a motion to adjourn having been made and voted down, the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order, but not of higher privilege than the motion to reconsider.

The question is upon laying upon the table the motion to reconsider, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 47, not voting 120; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barry, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bradley, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Williams, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barnum, Barrere, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Davis, DeWitt, Giddings, Glover, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Bass, Beck, Berry, Bland, Bright, Buffinton, Burchard, Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Robert S. McDill, McLean, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Schell, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, William A. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—120.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. CLEMENTS stated that he was paired with Mr. ROBBINS, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CURTIS stated that he was paired with Mr. ELDREDGE.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. There are certain members of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and I believe they ought to have the right to come in here and make their excuses. That motion takes precedence. They ought not to be kept out in custody.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks they had better be brought in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let them be brought in.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I move all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody members of the House absent without its leave.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, you have been reported as having been absent during the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. I was not well last evening, and Governor SWANN being in the same condition, we paired with each other.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from New Jersey has been brought here in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and he now says that he is paired. Suppose upon a call of the roll he answers that he is paired; will that clear him on the roll or the record or compel his voting to make a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It will not, for the House never knows anything about pairs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He must vote, then.

Mr. RANDALL. That is for himself to judge.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that he be excused.

Mr. NIBLACK. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order that that is not a matter of yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. For the reason, in the first place, that nobody objects to his being excused. I have not heard anybody object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ask unanimous consent, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the gentleman from New Jersey be excused; and on that motion the gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Can the yeas and nays be called on that? I thought the Speaker ruled——

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that pending the sending for members the yeas and nays could not be called on separate excuses and the member be not sent for; but if the member be brought here and presents an excuse, it requires a vote of the House to excuse him.

Mr. CONGER. These gentlemen have not been brought by the Sergeant-at-Arms. They are not in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is this moment in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CONGER. There was no order made for the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring these gentlemen here. He has no business to have them here.

Mr. WILBER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has not brought them. They have come in as a matter of request.

The SPEAKER. Then the Sergeant-at-Arms did not do what the House ordered him to do.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. They are not under arrest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has not the warrant issued?

Mr. STONE. It is evidently a case of false imprisonment.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that these gentlemen are not here in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms by order of the House.

The SPEAKER. Then they are not here by any right whatever; because the doors are closed.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. They are either here under the order of the House or they have no right to be here.

Mr. AVERILL. If so, they should be compelled to leave the House.

The SPEAKER. If that point of order is raised, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. COBURN. I ask that they may be considered to be here by unanimous consent.

Mr. PIERCE. I object.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to a question of privilege—what I regard as a question of the highest privilege. I move that the warrant do now issue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had supposed that it had issued some time since. But there need be no difficulty about this. The Sergeant-at-Arms can at once produce the gentlemen. The Chair has just signed the warrant, and the Sergeant-at-Arms can produce the gentlemen. It is evident they could not properly be here when the doors were closed, unless they came in obedience to the summons.

Mr. CONGER. It was suggested by a gentleman that there were gentlemen outside waiting to come in and that it was a hardship that they should wait longer. The Speaker then said that they should come in, and it is in that way that they are here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly thought they were in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CONGER. I should suppose the Chair must have known whether the warrant had issued.

The SPEAKER. There are many blank warrants. The Chair did not know whether the warrants had issued.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS then appeared at the bar, and said: In obedience to the order of the House, I present at the bar Mr. MARCUS L. WARD, of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms presents at the bar Mr. MARCUS L. WARD, of New Jersey, as he really presented him before; and the Chair again asks what excuse has the gentleman from New Jersey to offer for being absent from the sessions of the House?

Mr. CONGER. I think it important to raise another point of order. These gentlemen were present on the floor of the House, as I understand, before the warrant was signed. They were here as a part of this body before the warrant was signed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan think the Chair could rightly answer for taking advantage of that mistake to rule in their favor on that account?

Mr. WILBER. Just as well as the gentlemen on the other side of the House are answerable for not voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is answerable for what he does himself, not for what the House does. Does the gentleman from Michigan think the Chair should take advantage of that mistake and rule so? The doors were closed by order of the House. Will the gentleman from Michigan tell the Chair in what way, the doors being closed, a gentleman can come in, except by order of the House?

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair appeals to the gentleman from Michigan not to enforce the rules against the Speaker, he would be glad to withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to accommodate the gentleman from Michigan in any way he could under the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Then let the Sergeant-at-Arms enforce the order of the House against other absentees besides the gentleman now in his custody.

The SPEAKER. That will be done. The warrants have been issued for all the absentees.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that messengers be sent to execute them.

The SPEAKER. That is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms and not of the Chair. The Chair recommends the gentleman from Michigan to peruse the Manual.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. WARD, is at the bar in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. His excuse will now be heard.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. I have to say, as I said before, that I was not feeling very well last evening. Governor SWANN was in the same condition, and we agreed to pair, and went to our homes.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman from New Jersey be excused.

Mr. NIBLACK. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Pending that I move that all proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to know if it is in order to move that all the gentlemen who are now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms be excused; so that one calling of the yeas and nays will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. If further proceedings under the call are dispensed with, that would excuse everybody.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not know if the Chair apprehends my point. Would it be in order now to move to excuse all of the members who are in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms? If so one call of the yeas and nays would suffice for all, instead of there being a call of the yeas and nays for each member.

The SPEAKER. On the point of order the Chair will remark that the gentleman will observe himself that he might wish very much to excuse one gentleman and might wish very much not to excuse another.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I make that motion, that the members now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms be excused.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, any gentleman on the other side of the House could call the yeas and nays upon the question of excusing any member brought in, and then such member could be permitted to make a motion to reconsider and may have the yeas and nays on that, and thus the yeas and nays would be called twice upon excusing every member brought into the House. It is therefore utterly idle to talk about coming to any result by a continuation of the call, and I move that all further proceedings of the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the motion to excuse the gentlemen from New Jersey [Mr. WARD] apply to all the members now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Have we not a right to have the motion put in that way?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will see at once, the Chair thinks, the injustice of such a proceeding. There might be ten gentlemen in custody, one of whose offenses was flagrant; but if you put the question in relation to all of them as one question, whole and entire, the others might have to share the misfortunes of that gentleman. It is a question of the rights of the members at the bar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But who is going to raise the question if they do not object?

The SPEAKER. It is a parliamentary decision.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. But suppose these gentlemen do not object? If they do not object to being taken together, who else can object?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that you could not expel two members in the same resolution; you could not censure two members in the same resolution.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. But suppose they desire that their cases shall not be separated?

The SPEAKER. That would not be allowed if one member of the House objected. Where a member is implicated in an offense against the House, there is no principle of law more just than that he shall stand solely and singly.

Mr. CASON. But this is a proposition to relieve these gentlemen; we do not propose to inflict any penalty upon them.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the House may wish to inflict a penalty on one and none on another.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But we do not propose that.

Mr. NIBLACK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never known a precedent of this sort, and the purpose the gentleman seeks may be gained by dispensing with proceedings under the call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that, and we will dispense with the proceedings under the call when we get ready to do it; but I propose that, so far as these members now at the bar are concerned, we shall dispense with the proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can relieve these members by dispensing with the proceedings under the call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But why not dispense with them so as to have a dozen as well as forty excused?

The SPEAKER. You can do it if the House gives unanimous consent.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. This is so plain a question that I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. HYNES. Is it in order to move that all proceedings under the call be dispensed with with reference to the gentlemen now at the bar?

The SPEAKER. That is the same question on which the Chair has already ruled.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it arises from the line of argument used by the Chair. I believe there are three gentlemen in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Suppose a motion was made to excuse the whole three and that motion was carried; no man in the House would have a right to object; no man would be injured; but if that motion should fail, the object of the Chair would be reached by taking them separately.

The SPEAKER. That kind of parliamentary ruling that goes good affirmatively and bad negatively the Chair would not like to enforce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will suggest a precedent. Allow me to say that bills have been passed here for the relief from political disabilities, including two, three, or a dozen persons.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, by a two-thirds vote under the Constitution of the United States. But we are getting exceedingly technical at this time of the morning. I call for the reading of the rule that requires these cases to be disposed of separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply takes the precedents of the House for it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to see the precedents.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman ever known it otherwise?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has the Chair ever known a separate vote to be taken in such cases?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Does the Chair rule that we can dispense with the proceedings in regard to all, and cannot vote on the motion to dispense with the proceedings in regard to a portion of them?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Where the man himself does not object, does the Chair hold that any other member can object for him?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never has known two to be coupled together in the same resolution. This whole proceeding is most anomalous; the House is really proceeding with a quorum of members, and yet sending for absentees.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How do we know there is a quorum here?

The SPEAKER. Because the last vote showed that to be the fact.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And when we come to another vote there will not be any quorum here, and the Chair cannot see a man who wishes to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can see nothing but the roll-call in that respect.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CASON. Is there a precedent for the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Journal here is full of precedents showing that members are excused separately. And the idea that three members shall be brought up here and the rest of the members of the House forced to vote willy nilly upon excusing them in a lump, when they give different degrees of excuses, when one may have a good excuse and another may have committed a very grave offense—the putting them together upon a general average, and forcing the House to vote whether they will excuse them all or not, seems to the Chair to be utterly repugnant to all ideas of parliamentary law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Would it be any worse than to have Jeff Davis and some poor lieutenant put together in the same bill for the removal of political disabilities? We have put several in the same bill for that purpose.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The Chair has made his ruling. Has there been any appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. There has not.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to excuse the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WARD] now at the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. On that motion the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We may as well call the yeas and nays on that as anything else; only do not make the men stand up there while we do it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 7, not voting 134; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Bundy, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crounse, Danford, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Farwell, Finck, Fort, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Lawson, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McLean, McNulta, Mills, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Orr, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Randall, Ray, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, Henry B. Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Strawbridge, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—146.

NAYS—Messrs. Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Field, Page, Pelham, Rapier, and Small—7.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Ashe, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bowen, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Carpenter, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Creamer, Crossland, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dawes, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Foster, Freeman, Gunckel, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowndes, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Merriam, Milliken, Mitchell, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Packer, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Sloss, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, and John D. Young—134.

So the motion to excuse Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WARD] has been excused.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BROMBERG called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that we are now proceeding under a call of the House; that the motion to adjourn has been once made, and that it is not in order to make it again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that until further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, the motion to adjourn is hardly in order.

Mr. RANDALL. That there may not be any doubt I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to excuse the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Is that question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CESSNA. Perhaps my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] had better withdraw the motion to reconsider, in order to save doubt.

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barrere, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Milliken, Mills, Neal, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Schell, Southard, Speer, Storm, Whitehead, and John D. Young—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Atkins, Barber, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Williams, William Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—114

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SYPHER. I rise to a correction of the roll. I have not been out of the House to-night. Upon the last call of the House I answered to my name; I then went to the cloak-room and lay down. I ask that the correction be made—that I be recorded as present and voting. I have not been out of the House to-night.

The SPEAKER. The next of the absentees brought in is Mr. LAURIN D. WOODWORTH. Mr. WOODWORTH, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without leave. What excuse have you to render therefor?

Mr. WOODWORTH. I was ill last evening; and not apprehending that my presence would be required in the House, I did not attend the evening session. At about four o'clock this morning, having been informed of what was going on in the House, I came up here on my own motion. I was not taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms until I appeared on the floor of the House. I have no other excuse to offer.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. CLYMER. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBURN. I move by unanimous consent that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the gentleman from Ohio be excused, and then when unanimous consent is asked that he be excused the gentleman objects.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the gentleman from Ohio be fined one dollar and costs for contempt of the House.

Mr. HERNDON. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. COBURN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana is not in his seat and cannot make the motion.

Mr. COX. I renew it from my seat.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to amend by inserting five dollars and costs.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to lay that on the table.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a point of order. My motion is a substitute for the other motion that the gentleman be excused, and is not my substitute amendable in the second degree?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from West Virginia to move another amendment in the nature of a substitute that the gentleman from Ohio be fined five dollars and costs.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to insert five dollars and a half and costs.

The SPEAKER. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. NIBLACK. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. CONGER. Is another substitute in order?

The SPEAKER. It is a simple motion; it is not a paper, and the power to amend has been exhausted. One gentleman moves he be excused, another that he be fined one dollar and costs, and another that he be fined five dollars and costs. That exhausts the power of amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is not another amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. COX. You will have to change the rules again.

Mr. CONGER. Are the amendments germane to the motion that the gentleman be excused?

The SPEAKER. The question is, whether he be excused or punished. One is that he be excused, and the other is that he be punished instead.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Have you ever heard of a man being punished before he was convicted?

Mr. GARFIELD. O! yes. "Castigat auditque dolos" was the judgment of Rhadamanthus.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the yeas and nays will be considered as ordered on the several amendments. The first is to substitute five dollars and costs for one dollar and costs.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move the committee report another rule.

Mr. PAGE. Would it be in order for the gentleman to pay his fine?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know to whom he shall tender it.

Mr. PAGE. Let him tender it to the other side.

Mr. RANDALL. All we want is time and not cash.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Will it be in order to offer the gentleman a dollar to withdraw his motion?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia to amend by making the fine five dollars and costs.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Would it be in order to amend by providing that the gentleman be sent to jail for ten days?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order if one of the amendments were withdrawn or voted down.

Mr. CESSNA. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the amendment to the amendment was voted down, is not another one to strike out "one" and insert "two" in order, and would it not be in order to move to amend by inserting a different amount of fine, provided all the time one amendment is voted down, unless the previous question is called. Will not such an amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it has been held these motions are debatable, and therefore there is no necessity for calling the previous question.

Mr. CESSNA. But to cut off all amendments. My inquiry is this: Suppose the amendment should be voted down without the previous question being called, would it not be in order to strike out "one" and insert "four?"

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, and the gentleman will observe the power of duplicating motions is very great.

Mr. CESSNA. That is what I wished to get at.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move the previous question?

Mr. CESSNA. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. That has helped him by about seven jumps.

Mr. CESSNA. It is understood we have to sit here until a quorum arrives.

Mr. NIBLACK. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question will be considered as seconded, and the gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. HEREFORD. Can the main question be ordered when there is no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. That is yet to be determined.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. Gentlemen are continually going out of the House although the doors have been ordered to be locked.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of honor for each member.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me.

Mr. RANDALL. They put down their names as they go out and are registered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; they do not put down their names.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of honor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no direction and no honor. A man takes his hat and goes home, saying he is going out for fresh air.

Mr. RANDALL. I am informed that the name of every gentleman who goes out is taken down.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; that is not so.

Mr. STORM. If the gentleman will go and see, he will find it is so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have been to see. I can name at least three gentlemen who have gone home since this call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to deal with. It is a matter with which the Chair officially has nothing to do. The Chair is not the Doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair gives the orders to the Doorkeeper and the Doorkeeper obeys them.

The SPEAKER. No; the rules prescribe the duty of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. CONGER. It is but a short time since the Chair notified members that he had not ordered the doors to be opened, as if under the rules it was the Chair that controlled that matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prescribes the time during which, under orders of the House, the doors should be closed. It is the duty of the Chair, when a call of the House has been ordered, to direct the doors to be closed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think it is the duty of the Chair to have the order of the House enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to have the gentleman from Massachusetts point out what the Chair is required to do under the rules. The Chair does not take this as personal to himself.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts been out himself?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have been, and am a living witness to the fact.

A MEMBER. The gentleman went out upon his honor, and came back on his honor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There are twenty-two members out whose names are on the roll.

Mr. RANDALL. They are all in contempt.

Mr. CONGER. I understand they are all in the restaurant.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say this: I think that the question of the organization of the House of Representatives of the United States is not a farce, and I think that men should not be kept here upon procedure and rulings that make a mere farce of the constitutional right of the people to have their business go on.

Several MEMBERS. Order! Order!

Mr. RANDALL. We must deal with people as we find them. An undue and improper advantage was taken. It was a question of honor with this House that last night the appropriation bill should be proceeded with.

Mr. CESSNA. That is not the fact.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask who had the right to pledge the House to any such thing?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Is it not the rule that the majority controls?

Mr. RANDALL. It was agreed that, as stated by the chairman of the committee, the House should meet last evening for the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. COBURN. There was not a word of that kind said by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And for one I will not allow the statement of any man to bind me.

Mr. COX. I want to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman undertakes to give us a code for the regulation of our conduct. Now, on behalf of myself and the minority of this House, I claim the right, irrespective of any promise or pledge of anybody, whether he be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or whatever he be, to do our duty under the rules of the House as we find them and as we can use them to defeat a great wrong, and our constituents will not hold us guiltless unless we stand to that work.

I have not been in the habit of making these filibustering excursions, but I say that on this matter, to defeat a movement such as has been inaugurated last night, when nearly all the members understood the appropriation bill was to come up again, we are authorized by every code of honor, and by the rules of this House as yet unamended, to do what we have done.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say one word about that matter of understanding. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made the motion that the House take a recess, and said he desired to take up the appropriation bills, I immediately rose and, right in front of the Chair, in a loud tone, moved to amend his motion, in order that the night session might be for the purpose of considering this bill reported by the select committee appointed to investigate political affairs in Alabama. And the Speaker thereupon ruled that a motion of that kind was out of order, expressing the idea—I forget the words—that a motion for a recess was not conditioned, that it was absolute. And thereupon the Chair put the motion for a recess to the House in plain and unequivocal terms—the question whether or not the House would take a recess—the Chair not inserting the words of condition which had been used by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not put in a condition.

Mr. COBURN. And there was no condition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is only a fetch on the other side.

Mr. COBURN. These gentlemen who say they had no notice and no idea that we were to take up this election bill say so in the face of the declaration I made in loud tones, as loud tones as I am now speaking in. No man who paid attention to the business of the day, no man who was desirous to know what was going on here, could have failed to hear me make that explicit, open declaration, and I leave the House and the country to judge whether anybody was deceived for one moment. I repudiate and repel as unworthy of gentlemen the imputation that is undertaken to be cast upon us. We have done nothing excepting that which has been done in the most open, candid, fair, and explicit manner, without equivocation or dodging.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, on the 21st day of last December——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, I object to going back as far as that.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. This House, with singular promptitude——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I repeat that I object to going back so far.

Mr. HEREFORD. We listened to what you had to say, and I ask but one moment, and you can't cry me down in this manner.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. On the 21st day of last December this House, with singular promptitude, authorized the Speaker of the House to appoint a committee to investigate affairs in the State of Alabama; but we did not expect them to come in here with a force bill covering the whole United States and endeavor to force it on the people in this manner, and that in the midst of an appropriation bill, thereby defeating necessary legislation.

[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!" and "Regular order!"]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think there is now a quorum of republican members of the House in attendance, and I move, therefore, to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 42.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, noes 50, not voting 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hodges, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, McCrary, James W. McDill, McNulta, Merriam, Moore, Myers, Niles, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Glover, Gunter, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Luttrell, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Randall, Read, Southard, Standiford, Storm, Vance, Whitehead, Willie, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Buckner, Buffinton, Roderick R. Butler, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crossland, Crutchfield, Curtis, Davis, Dawes, Dobbins, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Fort, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hathorn, Havens, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lowndes, Magee, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Mitchell, Monroe, Morey, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sloss, William A. Smith, Speer, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—104.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House dismisses all further proceedings under the call, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors of the House were accordingly opened.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the House adjourn. I think it is about time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; I guess we will not adjourn just now.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of order that since the pending question, being on the consideration of this bill, has been before the House one motion to adjourn has been made and voted on, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is not in order.

The SPEAKER. O, no.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; a motion to adjourn was the first motion after the question of consideration was raised.

The SPEAKER. Then when would a motion to adjourn be again in order?

Mr. CONGER. When we have taken some steps upon the pending question and when it would not longer be a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. There is now no question pending but the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. The question pending is will we consider this bill. There has been no progress in it since a motion to adjourn was voted on by the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No business has been done by the House, for there has been no House to do business.

The SPEAKER. And you would tie up the House if every member of the House wanted to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. That would not tie up the House, because it could make some progress in the direction of the pending question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And then after we have made some progress we could adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. If there be any virtue at all in the restriction of dilatory motions imposed by the new rule, if there be any place where the rule preventing dilatory motions can possibly be applied, I submit to the Chair that it must come on this now pending question.

The SPEAKER. What is the pending question?

Mr. CONGER. It is, "Will the House consider the bill?"

The SPEAKER. Has there been a motion to adjourn pending that question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There were three or four of them.

Mr. CONGER. The first motion after that question was raised was a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had the impression that the motion to adjourn had not been submitted pending that question, but that the House had passed to other questions.

Mr. CONGER. I have endeavored to keep the order of these motions, so that when we did get along to the point we might make some progress.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] made the motion to adjourn.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think the order of business was this: the question was raised upon the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] raised the point of order upon the power of the committtee to report the bill, and the Chair made a ruling, and the appeal from it was voted upon and no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is mistaken in his recollection of the facts. The Chair thinks the question of appealing from the decision of the Chair was interposed, and that there was no question of adjournment that came directly upon the consideration of the bill. The Chair makes this statement of course with the liability of being mistaken. It is the impression of the Chair that no motion to adjourn came directly upon the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. My recollection is that the motion to adjourn was the very first question that followed the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. And pending that was there not an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. PAGE. I think the record will show the order of motions.

The SPEAKER. Ah, they are buried pretty deep just now.

Mr. CONGER. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair upon a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair, which of course may be entirely corrected when the record is made up, is that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] made his report the gentleman from West Virginia raised his point of order as to the right of the committee to make such a report. The Chair overruled that point of order, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] appealed from the decision of the Chair. A motion was also made to lay the appeal upon the table. The Chair thinks these motions come in between the consideration of the bill and any motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Then we reach a point—I think I cannot be mistaken—where a motion to adjourn, independent of any of these intermediate motions, was voted upon by the House.

The SPEAKER. The point is very simple. The Chair begs to say again that he does not wish to state it with definiteness, because his attention may not have been directed closely to it. The point is whether a motion to adjourn was submitted and voted upon when the question of consideration was the pending question.

Mr. CONGER. I think so.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact.

Mr. CONGER. That is my recollection.

The SPEAKER. Then, if that be so, the pending question now is upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, a quorum having failed to vote on it before.

Mr. CONGER. The pending question now is, if I understand it, upon the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is the same thing.

Mr. CONGER. On it there was not a quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Therefore that vote has never been completed.

Mr. CONGER. But there was, pending that motion, a motion to adjourn; there is no doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will not extend his argument. Let us go right at it and vote. What is the use of going over all this matter now?

Mr. CONGER. I want to understand what the question is.

Mr. NEGLEY. Let the gentlemen upon the other side put themselves on the record as often as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] then agrees with the Chair that the pending question is upon laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. CONGER. And that a motion to adjourn was taken pending that question.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that pending the appeal a motion to adjourn was made and put, and cannot be again put pending that appeal.

Mr. NEGLEY. I then call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs, "Will the House lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair?"

Mr. NIBLACK. Is not my motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, because a motion to adjourn has been once put pending this appeal.

Mr. CONGER. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. They were ordered, but no quorum voted. They have not been ordered anew. The yeas and nays are now demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nay 1, not voting 151; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Williams, William Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—151.

The SPEAKER. On this question the affirmative vote is 135, the negative 1.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, and Mr. RANDALL moved a call of the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope we shall have a call of the House this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I hope so, too.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In order to give time for members to come in, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Suppose the motion to lay on the table is withdrawn; the next question will be, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" Upon that, if we have the yeas and nays, I think we shall have a quorum. I ask that the gentleman who made the motion to lay on the table withdraw it, and let the question be put to the House in the shape I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not quite see how that can be done.

Mr. CONGER. Why not?

The SPEAKER. How can the Chair entertain business in the absence of a quorum?

Mr. CESSNA. The Chair may very readily presume that there will be a quorum here before we verify the last vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot presume that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. On the motion for a call of the House the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 28, not voting 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—151.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrere, Barry, Cason, Stephen A. Cobb, Danford, Darrall, Duell, Dunnell, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Howe, Hynes, Kasson, Lowndes, Lynch, McLean, Merriam, Moore, Nesmith, Orr, Ray, Sawyer, Smart, William A. Smith, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—28.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Buffinton, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Carpenter, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gunter, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harrison, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Luttrell, Magee, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Wood—108.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the absentees be sent for.

The SPEAKER. The call will first have to take place.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Albert, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Buffinton, Burchard, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crutchfield, Dawes, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Foster, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hurlbut, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, Mitchell, Nunn, Orr, Orth, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloss, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Wallace, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Wood.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The absentees will be first called.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As a quorum is present we might save time by dispensing with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The rule is absolute to call the absentees.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Upon the call two hundred and five members have answered to their names. The doorkeepers will now close the doors.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe I have the right now to move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope not. I desire the odium to attach to the republicans who have coalesced with our enemies as well as those who have remained away from the sittings of the House shirking their duty in a shameless manner and detaining us here all night, and who have so far prevented us from enacting any legislation to secure the better enforcement of the laws and equal protection to all American citizens in every section.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to have that done as much as anybody, but their names will appear in the list of absentees and that is all the good you can do. You can only show them to their constituents in the RECORD. We have a quorum of republicans in this Hall now.

Mr. NEGLEY. I should like to see the spectacle of the candidates for the Presidency, for judges, and for prominent positions on committees in the next House arrayed before the House for absence from the House without its leave. I leave the country to surmise the real motives of these absentees.

Mr. RUSK. I am one of the absentees, and I should like to tell the House why it is that I was absent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can tell why he has been absent; he has been sick, for I inquired into it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the absentees be sent for.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with as there is now a quorum in the Hall.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 58, not voting 115; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hubbell, Hunter, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Ross, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Hunton, Knapp, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Robbins, Milton Sayler, Southard, Standiford, Storm, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, and John D. Young—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Finck, Foster, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, John T. Harris, Havens, John B. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Luttrell, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, Merriam, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Nesmith, Nunn, Orr, Orth, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Read, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Sawyer, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloan, Sloss, Smart, John Q. Smith, Speer, Stanard, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—115.

So the House dispensed with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move the House adjourn, and pending that I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. In what condition will it leave the bill if the House adjourns?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as the unfinished business after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. Are you sincere in that motion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether it will not take during the next legislative day two-thirds to call the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It will until next morning.

Mr. NEGLEY. We can afford to spend a day on this question, and I hope the House will agree to the adjournment now.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 53, noes 66.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire to ask of the Chair whether the motion to adjourn is in order pending the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is superior in privilege to the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What is its effect on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It holds up the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Suppose the motion to reconsider should not be put till to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would then be too late. The House will have adjourned.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It may or may not.

The SPEAKER. The House would have proceeded to other business.

Mr. CESSNA. Has the motion to adjourn been withdrawn or was it voted down?

The SPEAKER. It was voted down on a division, and the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered thereon.

Mr. CESSNA. Did the Chair rule that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was superior to that of his colleague [Mr. NEGLEY] to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled just the contrary. But pending the motion to adjourn, the motion to reconsider is still a motion pending.

Mr. NEGLEY. If it is the desire of the republicans in this House to remain here for the consideration of this bill I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. That does not make any difference. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House evidently does not want to adjourn and a motion is made as a dilatory motion, is not the Speaker the judge of that under our rule?

The SPEAKER. But the rule is very specific that pending the lack of a quorum but two motions are in order, one to adjourn and one for a call of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But there is a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. But that cannot deprive the House of the right to try the motion to adjourn, because the rule gives it specifically.

Mr. POTTER. Pending the call.

Mr. BARRY. Is there not also the power to reconsider the motion by which the call of the House was ordered? Does not that make three motions that are in order?

The SPEAKER. Only two motions are pending; the motion to reconsider the vote dispensing with further proceedings under the call, and the motion to adjourn made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 111, not voting 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Potter, Read, Robbins, Milton Sayler, Sener, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Storm, Thompson, Vance, Wells, White, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, and John D. Young—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hodges, Howe, Hunter, Hynes, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Martin, Maynard, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Packard, Packer, Page, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheats, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—111.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Buffinton, Burchard, Cain, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dawes, Duell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Foster, Garfield, Glover, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Leach, Lewis, Lynch, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, Merriam, Mitchell, Morey, Myers, Nunn, Orr, Orth, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Randall, Rapier, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloss, Snyder, Stanard, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Wheeler, Whitehead, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—107.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STARKWEATHER.) The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to reconsider the vote dispensing with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. And on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 3, not voting 182; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barry, Biery, Burleigh, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Howe, Hunter, Hynes, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, St. John, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, and James Wilson—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Hereford, and Speer—3.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley-Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Randall, Ray, Read, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Stanard, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles A. Stevens, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—182.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The doors will be opened, proceedings under the call having been dispensed with.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have a proposition which I would like to submit to the House, and which I hope will be acceptable to both sides of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That would be impossible.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope it will be. I propose to report from the Committee on War Claims a bill making appropriations to pay claims allowed by the Department and put it on its passage now. There ought to be no possible objection to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No war claims now, until something is done for justice.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. POTTER. The result of this last vote is to show a less number of members present than at any time during the night—but 105. I think the House ought now to adjourn.

Mr. FIELD. They were not waked up to vote.

Mr. WILBER. We were down stairs getting breakfast.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon laying on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is a good question to vote on.

Mr. POTTER. Pending that motion, would a motion to adjourn be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not be.

Mr. CESSNA. We have voted down a motion to adjourn pending this motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 136, nay none, not voting 151; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barry, Begole, Biery, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Howe, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Lansing, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—151.

The SPEAKER. No quorum have voted.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move a call of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And pending that motion I move that when the House adjourn it be to meet——

Many MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We are not going to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is not in order. When a vote discloses the absence of a quorum there are but two motions in order, one for a call of the House and the other to adjourn.

The question then recurred upon the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, (at ten o'clock and ten minutes a. m.) I move that the House adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 111, not voting 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—107.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. POLAND in the chair.) The question recurs on the motion for a call of the House, on which the yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. CESSNA. As the last vote develops the presence of a quorum, perhaps my friend on the other side will withdraw his motion for a call of the House.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 163, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—163.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bradley, Buckner, Burchard, Cain, Carpenter, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crounse, Danford, Davis, Eames, Eden, Finck, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Hatcher, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Mitchell, Neal, Niles, Packer, Parsons, Phelps, Potter, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, Stone, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Wolfe—52.

So the House refused to order a call.

During the roll call,

Mr. SLOSS said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. EAMES. If present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to lay that motion on the table, and on my motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. Are not these dilatory motions? Should not the question be taken directly upon laying on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HYNES. I submit this parliamentary inquiry: If the vote on the refusal of the House to order a call develops the fact that a quorum is present, is it in order to move to reconsider that motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. POLAND in the chair.) The regular occupant of the chair has so ruled.

Mr. NEGLEY. I believe we shall save time by proceeding with the roll-call, and I have called for the yeas and nays upon the pending motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 79, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—163.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Dawes, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Perry, Pierce, Potter, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crounse, Curtis, Eames, Eden, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Holman, Howe, Hubbell, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Marshall, Martin, Mitchell, Nunn, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phelps, Rainey, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, and Wolfe—45.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call was laid on the table.

During the roll-call the following announcement was made:

Mr. SLOSS. I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.] If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NEGLEY. I raise the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair decide that the motion to adjourn is not in order when not accompanied by a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Upon what ground does the Chair rule my motion out of order?

The SPEAKER. Because on the pending question as many motions of that kind have been made as the rules allow.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There has been intervening business since a motion to adjourn was made, and a motion to adjourn is not in the nature of a dilatory motion or the House might be placed in an attitude where it could not adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It was the very last question voted on.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The last question voted on was a motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call.

The SPEAKER. But it was the last vote taken prior to that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. At least two yeas and nays have been taken since a motion to adjourn was voted on.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the motion in order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I must respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Many MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is not the appeal under the circumstances a dilatory motion?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not see how the House can ever get out of session if a motion to adjourn is in its nature a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not in its nature a dilatory motion; but there are two reasons why the Chair cannot entertain the appeal, one of which will certainly be satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin while the other will not. One is that the rules absolutely forbid the Chair entertaining an appeal when another appeal is pending. Now the very question pending is an appeal from the decision of the appeal.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me suppose a case, (which perhaps is not possible in point of fact,) that the Speaker should be wrong on a motion intervening after an appeal has been taken, that he should be absolutely wrong, violating all parliamentary law; must the House submit to that?

The SPEAKER. The majority of the House will find a way out of any such difficulty.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the rule to which the Speaker refers is where an appeal is pending on this very question, relating to the same subject on which the appeal is now sought to be taken.

The SPEAKER. The appeal is not in order while another appeal is pending.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose that must relate to an appeal on the same question.

The SPEAKER. It has no qualification whatever.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then the Speaker could be absolutely wrong.

The SPEAKER. That is quite probable; he might be. It is by no means impossible.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not say he is, but merely state the supposition; but there may be a case where the Speaker may violate all parliamentary law, and has the House no remedy?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe the only thing the House has to decide is this appeal until the motion to adjourn comes to be in order, so that the working of the decision cannot be a great hardship.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I know we can renew the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There are two grounds, which are these: It is exhausted because it has been once tried on the pending question. The gentleman may differ from the Chair, but on the absolute literal rule the Chair cannot entertain one appeal while another is pending.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On that I reserve the right to take an appeal after the other one is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Then the whole question will be changed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That may or may not be.

Mr. NEGLEY. What is the condition of the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is reserving the right to appeal on a condition of circumstances which passes out from under him.

Mr. TREMAIN. He reserves a right which does not exist.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the condition of the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is as the Chair will state it for the benefit of gentlemen who were not present. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] made the point of order that the Special Committee on Alabama Affairs had no right to report the bill which has been reported. The Chair overruled that point of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] took an appeal. That appeal has been voted on three times.

Mr. CESSNA. The motion to lay it upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the motion to lay the appeal upon the table has been voted on three times, but no quorum voted either time, and it comes over so that it is now the pending question. The question recurs, will the House lay upon the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROMBERG. Cannot we have the resolution creating this committee read for the information of those who were not here when the appeal was taken?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The republican vote, as I understand it, is "ay."

Mr. COX. I ask the Chair to state precisely the question on which the appeal is taken. I wish to know the nature of the decision of the Chair and the appeal which has been taken from it.

The SPEAKER. The Alabama committee was created by a resolution passed under suspension of the rules instructing and directing them to inquire into a certain state of facts in Alabama. There is on specific words giving that committee the right to report a bill. On that the gentleman from West Virginia, raises the point that the committee was not authorized to report a bill. The Chair overruled the point of order, on the general ground that the committee could report any remedial measure pertinent to the subject of the investigation. From that decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] appeals, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] moves to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 165, nays 74, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—166.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Sloss, Snyder, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Brown, Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Curtis, Davis, Eden, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Herndon, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Lofland, McNulta, Mitchell, Phelps, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Rainey, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Stowell, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, George Willard, and Woodworth—47.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that upon all questions pending in the House since eleven o'clock last evening I was paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BECK.

Mr. MCNULTA. I desire to say that I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS, until one o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m. to-day.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, was called from the House in consequence of sickness in his family, and is unable to be here this morning.

Mr. SNYDER. My colleague, Mr. HYNES, was called home by the illness of his wife an hour ago.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is not that a dilatory motion?

Mr. CESSNA. I make the point of order that it is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how, if the motion itself is not dilatory, the reconsideration could be so regarded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The appeal itself was a dilatory motion last night.

The SPEAKER. Not so recorded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House laid on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair—is that motion to reconsider in order?

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I never heard it made in my life.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is no reason why it is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Suppose the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is carried and the action of the House is reconsidered, would it be in order to move to lay that on the table again?

The SPEAKER. That would imply that a majority first laid the motion on the table and then reconsidered its action. If the majority should choose to go from one side to the other, the Chair does not know anything in the rules to prevent them.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair if this is not evidently a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. If the appeal is not dilatory, neither is the motion to reconsider. This principle must always be acknowledged, that when the direct motion is in order, the motion to reconsider is in order. They cannot be separated. The right to make the direct motion being conceded, the right to reconsider is absolute.

Mr. WHEELER. This is simply a motion, as I understand it, to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is it exactly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that there is some misapprehension respecting the ruling of the Chair. If this is tabled, can it be again renewed?

The SPEAKER. If the House should reconsider it, the question again comes up for the action of the House; but if the House tables the motion to reconsider, that ends it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not myself misunderstand the Chair.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORT. I wish to raise the point of order whether a gentleman voting with the minority can move to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin who moved to reconsider voted with the majority.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair in putting the question rightly, that this was a motion to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid on the table, and the pending question is on the motion to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is all right.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 157, nays 74, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner Walls, James D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—157.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, De Witt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Stone, Storm, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Averill, Burchard, Caulfield, Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Curtis, Dawes, Duell, Eden, Farwell, Foster, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Hunter, Hynes, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lawrence, McNulta, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Nesmith, Phelps, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheats, Smart, William A. Smith, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waldron, Wallace, Wilber, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—56.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. Before this present motion which has been finally decided as to the appeal, the pending question was the question of consideration raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Is this a debatable question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is stating his point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I say that the pending question was the question of consideration raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] upon the bill presented by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] Upon that the rule applies, that when any question is pending the Speaker shall entertain but two dilatory motions: the one a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn and the other a motion to adjourn. Both those motions have been put over and over again since this question was pending; and the fact that there has intervened other business, such as a call of the House and on the appeal on a point of order, one of them necessary because there was no quorum and the other delay to this time for want of a quorum, does not affect the rule, the intent of which, as explained by the Chair from the floor and from the desk at the time it passed, was to cut off all dilatory motions after the question is stated until the call for the previous question, and then it is to be decided on the first day in one form and on the second day in another.

Now, we have voted on motions to adjourn and on motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn over and over again. There can be no end to these proceedings, and the rule is utterly valueless if it does not protect the majority now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to take this view: that as the bill now is it comes before the House and is upon its engrossment and third reading; and that there having been two motions made, one to adjourn and another to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, they never can be repeated until that point is passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ground myself upon the reading of the rule, the first clause of which I should like the Chair to have read. It is that when one question is pending there shall be but two dilatory motions entertained: one to adjourn and one to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn.

Now, the question of consideration has been pending, I think, since about one o'clock last night, and the two dilatory motions have been made and voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Journal to be read, and gentlemen will please pay attention to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COBURN, from the select committee on the condition of political affairs in the State of Alabama, to which was recommitted the bill of the House No. 4745, to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections under the authority heretofore granted, reported the same without amendment.

Pending which, Mr. HEREFORD raised the point of order that the said committee, being a select committee, had no right to report the bill.

The Chair decided that the point of order was not well taken.

From that decision of the Chair Mr. RANDALL appealed.

Mr. CONGER moved that the appeal be laid on the table.

Pending which,

Mr. RANDALL moved (at two o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.) that the House adjourn.

And the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 133.

So the House again refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the motion to adjourn was pending the appeal from the decision of the Chair; that pending the consideration of the bill there were other questions that supervened before the motion to adjourn was submitted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, going back of that, the point I take is this: after the bill was presented, and after the question of consideration was raised, then the point of order was raised.

The SPEAKER. And by the raising of that point of order, and by the appeal, the House immediately passed to another question than that of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But we left the question of consideration still pending, and it is pending yet, and it has been pending from that hour to this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the rule to be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before that is done permit me to say that the Journal as read does not show that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] raised the question of consideration; I think the Chair will recollect that he did it. Then the point of order was made by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD;] but the gentleman from Pennsylvania raised the question of consideration before the point of order was raised by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The question of order was not raised until after the reading of the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE —. Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn; but the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration, unless two-thirds of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or other property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. That is, the two motions to which reference is made in the rule relate to the power of the House to have them entertained when a question is immediately pending. This question might have gone over, if the House had been able to obtain a quorum, as it was without one for some twelve or fourteen hours on the side that was trying to secure legislation—this question might have gone over for several days. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts would hardly present this point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should present the point whenever we got back to that question.

Mr. CESSNA. I would ask, what is the pending question now?

The SPEAKER. It is, "Will the House now consider this bill?" And pending that no motion to adjourn has been made till now.

Mr. CESSNA. There was a motion made to adjourn after the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That appeal raised another question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The question of consideration was then pending.

The SPEAKER. It might have been pending for three or four days.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very possibly; but it could not have been except for dilatory motions.

The SPEAKER. Has the motion to adjourn ever been put immediately pending the question of consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand the object of the rule is to bring the House at a single session to a vote on the bill if two-thirds shall order the previous question; otherwise the rule is simply nugatory.

The SPEAKER. Then if the House wanted to debate the question another day they would be precluded from so doing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means; debate is not dilatory.

The SPEAKER. But when they came to the motion to adjourn—they could not get over to another day without adjourning.

Mr. CESSNA. The Chair stated that he was to determine whether a motion was a dilatory motion or not.

The SPEAKER. The question now is not so much as to motive as to the literal meaning of the rule. "Whenever a question is pending before the House." Now pending the consideration of this question, has there been a motion to adjourn submitted?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, eight of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, and therefore rules that this motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PAGE. It is this: How many more dilatory motions can be entertained by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. But one more; the motion to adjourn and the motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, are the two dilatory motions which can now be entertained.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, we have struck bottom, then, within two motions.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 165, not voting 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Marshall, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Potter, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Schell, Sener, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Atkins, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Shanks, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Sprague, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—165.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barnum, Beck, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Chittenden, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crittenden, Curtis, Eden, Farwell, Foster, Giddings, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Holman, Hynes, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Loughridge, Magee, Maynard, McLean, McNulta, Mitchell, Morey, Nesmith, O'Brien, Poland, Rainey, Randall, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodworth—52.

So (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. COBURN. I ask now that the House proceed with the consideration of the bill reported by me; that it be taken up and read.

Mr. HEREFORD. I send to the desk the resolution which is privileged.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That this House adjourn to March 1.

Mr. HEREFORD. In connection with that resolution I ask the Clerk to read a passage which I have marked in Barclay's Digest.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] is not in order.

Mr. COBURN. That motion being out of order, I desire that the Clerk shall now proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that the extract from Barclay's Digest sent up by the gentleman from West Virginia be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution proposing, with the concurrence of the Senate, an adjournment for more than three days is held to be privileged.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point——

The SPEAKER. There is no need of raising any point. The resolution is not in order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On what grounds?

The SPEAKER. The rule is explicit. The Clerk will read a rule which was adopted about eight years since.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House do now adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read the first clause of the new rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It has been the uniform habit, not only of the present occupant of the chair but of his immediate predecessor, to decline to receive any appeal under the rule first read, because in the first place it is so explicit that there can be no doubt of its meaning, and in the second place its purpose would be wholly perverted and destroyed if an appeal were allowed, because appeals could be put in without limit as dilatory motions.

Mr. COBURN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The House divided; and there were ayes 52, noes not counted.

Mr. COBURN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Is that motion amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is not; that would make two motions.

Mr. COX. I move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain it.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 173, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Schell, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—173.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Crittenden, Curtis, Dawes, Eden, Finck, Foster, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, McNulta, Mitchell, Morey, Nesmith, Poland, Rainey, Ellis H. Roberts, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sloss, Alexander H. Stephens, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, Wheeler, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodworth—34.

So the House refused to adjourn over until Saturday next.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now raise the question of consideration.

Mr. COBURN rose.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a question of order, that the gentleman from Indiana is not in his seat.

Mr. COBURN. I am occupying the seat of a friend who has yielded it to me temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not sustain the point of order.

In reference to the proceedings under the amended rule the Chair begs to call the attention of the House to the fact that the last two motions are the only ones which have been made in order and the only ones which could have been made had the report come in at this hour. The proceedings of the long night session had no reference whatever to the amended rule, but arose from causes to which the amended rule had no application and was not intended to have any application.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] from the Select Committee on Alabama Affairs, reports back a bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. COBURN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not my point in order before the reading?

The SPEAKER. It is either way.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I raise the question of consideration at once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin raises the point of consideration; and the question is, Will the House now consider this bill?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CESSNA. I understood that was pending all the time.

The SPEAKER. Of course; but it has to be voted on.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 170, nays 89, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—89.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Eden, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Kendall, Killinger, Mitchell, Page, Phelps, Rainey, Ransier, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Charles W. Willard, and Ephraim K. Wilson—28.

So the House agreed to consider the bill, H. R. No. 4745.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2765) granting a pension to John W. Darby.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to consider the bill, H. R. No. 4745.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 85, not voting 41; follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Beck, Bell, Burleigh, Burrows, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Curtis, Darrall, Eden, Foster, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Havens, Hendee, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Mitchell, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, O'Neill, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Ellis H. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Charles R. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Tremain, Waldron, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—41.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4745) was laid on the table.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. COBURN rose.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. NIBLACK. The point of order I make is that section 9 of the bill provides for the creation of new offices, and that the bill therefore must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know anything about section 9. The bill has not been read. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask that the point of order may be held in reserve until the bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the Chair decide that the motion to adjourn is not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. A different question is now pending. The question of consideration has been disposed of and the bill is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not really and in fact a different question. The next stage of the bill is upon its third reading. The mere motion as to whether the House shall now consider it does not present a different phase at all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The question was, would the House consider the bill. The House has decided that it will consider it now. The next question is on the bill itself, and that is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. That does not change the status of the bill at all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I concede that. But the question is an entirely different one.

Mr. CESSNA. I raise the question of order that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] who reported the bill, is entitled to be recognized and not the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I must appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the appeal.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall invade any of the States of this Union for the purpose of forcibly overthrowing the existing government of said State, or any constituted authority of the same, or for the purpose of interfering in any forcible or unlawful manner with the due execution of the laws of said State or of the United States; or if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall conspire with any other person or persons for any of the unlawful purposes hereinbefore recited, with intent to commit the same, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 2. That if two or more persons shall conspire together to overthrow by force or to usurp by violence the State government of any of the States of this Union, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall in fact, by force and violence, attempt to subvert or usurp such State government, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall, by like force and violence, actually overthrow the existing government of any State, or any department thereof, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 3. That any person or persons using or proposing to use fire-arms or other deadly weapons against any peaceable individual or individuals, or assemblages of the same, at or near the place and on the day or days of registration or holding an election for Representatives or Delegates to Congress, for the purpose of intimidating or injuring such individual or individuals while such election is in progress, and before the same shall have been completed, or before such election has commenced to be held, for the purpose of intimidating such individuals from coming to the same, shall be guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and imprisoned not less than one year and not more than three years, at the discretion of the court trying the same: Provided, That in all prosecutions under this act the open or concealed carrying of fire-arms or other deadly weapons at such elections or place of registration shall be taken as presumptive evidence of the intent to intimidate under this act.

SEC. 4. That in case the registration officers appointed under the laws of any State or Territory, where by the laws of said State or Territory registration is required as a condition of voting at any election for Representatives in Congress, shall willfully or corruptly refuse or neglect to give any person entitled to vote, at any precinct or voting place established under the provisions of the laws of Congress, or of any State or Territory, full and sufficient opportunities to register in the manner prescribed by law, and within the time fixed by law, or shall, by any device or subterfuge, impose conditions or enforce discriminations upon voters or classes of voters not declared in such registration laws, or shall refuse or neglect, on request made by the voter or his agent, to furnish such voter with a certificate of registration, or such other form of evidence of the same as may by law be required in such State or Territory, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 5. That any person or persons who, at any election for a Representative to Congress, shall, by cunning or device, fraud or force, take, or cause to be taken, from the legal custodian or custodians of the same, or from any place where kept in deposit by any such custodian or custodians, the box or boxes of ballots, or the poll-lists, or either of them, or shall carry away, conceal, scatter, deface, mutilate, or destroy said ballots or poll-lists, or any or either of them, before the final count and comparison of the same has been completed, and the result of the election ascertained and publicly announced, or before the time has expired for which such ballots and poll-lists, or either of them, have to be preserved under the laws of the United States or of such State and Territory, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and imprisoned not less than two years nor more than five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 6. That if in the prosecution of any of the undertakings hereinbefore declared unlawful, or in the commission of any of the offenses hereinbefore set forth, any person not participant in said offenses or unlawful undertakings, shall be killed by any persons engaged in the same, or any of them, such killing shall constitute the crime of murder; and any person committing the same, or accessory before the fact to such commission, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer the penalty of death.

SEC. 7. That the district courts of the United States, within their several districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses against the provisions of this act, and also concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States of all causes, civil or criminal, arising under this act, except as herein otherwise provided; and the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and practice governing United States courts; and all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act may be prosecuted by the indictment of a grand jury, or, in cases of crimes and offenses not infamous, may be, either by indictment or information, filed by the district attorney in a court having jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. That the supervisors of elections hereafter appointed for any county, parish, or voting precinct in any congressional district, at the instance of ten citizens, as provided in existing laws, shall exercise the same powers and perform the same duties as are now given to and required from supervisors in towns and cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. All supervisors of elections within any congressional district may hereafter be appointed from the congressional district; and the judge of the circuit court of the United States within whose circuit such district may be situate shall appoint such supervisors on petition as now provided by law at least thirty days prior to the registration or election in which they are to act; and one of said supervisors, so appointed by said judge, shall be by him denominated as chief supervisor of said congressional district, and shall possess the powers and perform the duties now required by law of a chief supervisor.

SEC. 9. That the provisions of existing laws as to the appointment, powers, and duties of special deputy marshals for cities and towns of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, in elections for Representatives to Congress, are hereby extended to the several counties, parishes, and voting precincts in each congressional district, and such special deputies may be selected from any portion of such congressional district.

SEC. 10. That at all elections for Representatives in Congress hereafter held, the managers of such elections or board of officers charged with the conduct of the said election, by whatever title denominated at the several polling places, shall immediately, after the closing of the polls, and before separating or adjourning to any other time or place, count and declare, in the presence of the supervisor and deputy marshal, if any shall have been appointed and shall be present at said polling place, the result of the vote polled at said place of election, and shall thereupon immediately certify the same so far as relates to Representatives in Congress or presidential electors, if voted for in said election under the laws of the State, and shall deliver such certificate to said supervisor or deputy marshal, which ever may be present; and such supervisor or deputy marshal, as the case may be, shall at once transmit such certificate to the chief supervisor of the congressional district, who shall, as soon as practicable, forward the same to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. And the officer or officers charged with the canvassing or consolidation of the vote of any county, city, or parish shall in like manner perform such duty in the presence of such supervisor, if present, who shall, if appointed, attend in each county, city, or parish at the time and place provided by law for such canvass and consolidation.

SEC. 11. That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained.

SEC. 12. That the ballots, poll-lists, tally-sheets, or other papers which by the law of any State are evidence of an election, and which have been used in elections for Representatives to Congress, shall hereafter be preserved and safely kept by the custodian provided by the laws of the several States until the close of the first session of the Congress to be affected by such election; that either party to an election contest in the House of Representatives of the United States, in which contest an allegation of fraudulent count or change of ballots is made, may have a subpœna directed to said custodian, who shall, if so required by said subpœna, produce such original ballots, lists, and other papers connected with said election, and the same, after the usual notice to the contestant or contestee, may be examined and compared before any person in the county or parish authorized to take depositions in contested elections, and such person shall certify under his hand and seal, and forward in the manner provided by law, said examination and comparison, to be used as evidence in the case. After said examination and comparison shall be completed, said ballots, lists of voters, and other papers shall be returned to their lawful custodian in the same condition as when by him produced before said examining officer.

SEC. 13. That whenever in any State or part of a State the unlawful combinations tions named in section 5299 of the Revised Statutes and in the first and second sections of this act shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able by violence to either overthrow or set at defiance the constitnted authorities of said State and of the United States within said State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and, during the continuance of such rebellion, and within the limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the President shall first have made proclamation, as provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. NIBLACK. I now ask that the Chair shall rule on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please state his point of order.

Mr. NIBLACK. My point of order is that sections 8 and 9 of the bill create new offices. First, in the eighth section by reorganizing offices in such a way as to create new offices, and in the ninth section by extending existing offices over Territories not now provided for, and thus creating new offices. I also call the attention of the Chair to section 11, to show that this is the construction of these sections. And therefore, under the rule, this bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill provide for paying any money out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. NIBLACK. That is not the question; it creates new officers, and if the Chair has any doubt about it I ask to have the rule on the subject read.

Mr. COBURN. I call the attention of the Chair to the eleventh section of the bill.

Mr. SPEER. But an amendment allowing these officers compensation would be germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the very point. If such an amendment were in order the bill would go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CESSNA. The Chair will rule upon such an amendment when it comes up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] to make the point that the rule forbids the creation of any new officers.

Mr. NIBLACK. My point is that any bill providing for the creation of new officers, or which in the language of the Chair in the Utah case naturally tends in that direction, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule read to which he supposes the gentleman refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. Now the question is, does this measure make an appropriation of money, or does it require an appropriation to be made, or does it authorize the payment of any money out of appropriations already made? Does it not rather absolutely and in terms exclude the possibility of all these modes of expenditure?

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist that the natural tendency of the creation of new officers is to create a charge upon the public Treasury.

The SPEAKER. But the language is, "that no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained."

Mr. SPEER. But an amendment striking out that section would be in order.

The SPEAKER. O, no. It is no more in order to strike out that section in the bill than it would be to insert a section providing for the payment of these officers.

Mr. SPEER. Either would be in order.

The SPEAKER. Neither would be in order. The gentleman will remember that in the Utah case an attempt was made to secure that by getting in an amendment of this kind; but it did not follow that the House would adopt the amendment, and the Chair could not infer that it would be adopted.

Mr. SPEER. Was not the Chair about sending the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the point of order when the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] withdrew it?

The SPEAKER. What bill?

Mr. SPEER. The Utah bill.

The SPEAKER. Well; but that bill did not contain this provision: "That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained."

Mr. SPEER. Which provision does the Chair refer to?

The SPEAKER. The provision of the eleventh section: "That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained."

Mr. SPEER. That section says that no officer created under this act shall receive any compensation, but now the point is that an amendment giving them compensation would be germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. If such an amendment be adopted, then the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole right off. It cannot be maintained that the House of Representatives is unable to appoint an officer or a commissioner or agent without pay or emolument of any kind whatever without having the matter considered in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman cannot maintain that.

Mr. NIBLACK. The concluding portion of the eleventh section is, "nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained." But that clause continues the compensation to these officers.

The SPEAKER. Not at all; the gentleman does not read it correctly: "That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained." That language absolutely excludes the possibility of taking any money from the public Treasury.

Mr. NIBLACK. I regret to differ from the Chair, but I respectfully take an appeal from his decision.

Mr. SPEER. Do I understand the Chair to say that an amendment would not be in order striking out the eleventh section?

The SPEAKER. If a gentleman offered a specific proposition to pay these officers the Chair would not admit it.

Mr. SPEER. Why?

The SPEAKER. Simply because it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, because it provides for the payment of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. SPEER. The Chair would not refuse to admit the amendment on the ground that it was not germane to the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is not the point at all; the point is that it makes an appropriation. It might be germane to the bill, but should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. And if admitted it would send the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will ask an appeal from the decision of the Chair; I do it with all respect to the Chair.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is purely a dilatory motion.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a point of order, and claim the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. The Attorney-General has decided in the case of John W. Wright that an officer who does not receive compensation is not an officer of the United States; but if he be an officer he would be entitled to compensation.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman's authority is good, would it not follow if he does not receive compensation that he is not an officer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] state what particular feature of the rule this bill violates.

Mr. COX. What is the number of the rule.

The SPEAKER. It is Rule 112. Does this bill violate that portion which relates to a bill making appropriations of money, or requiring an appropriation to be made, or authorizing payment to be made out of any other appropriation?

Mr. NIBLACK. I am assuming that the creation of a number of officers would necessarily result in an appropriation from the Treasury to pay them. And with all due respect I must appeal from the decision of the Chair. I have been informed—I do not know, for I have not read it thoroughly—that there is an appropriation in the sundry civil bill itself which could be used to pay the expenses of the officers authorized by this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no appropriation of that sort in the bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. An appropriation that might be used in that way if this bill should become a law.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no appropriation there except to pay some supervisors in Philadelphia some old pay due them from the last election.

Mr. NIBLACK. Besides, this bill gives additional jurisdiction to the United States courts, and that inevitably will result in a charge on the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. No amount of money that might be appropriated would enable persons to receive pay whom the law says shall not re-receive it.

Mr. BECK. If this bill creates new officers, and should become a law, would not the Committee on Appropriations have a right to report an appropriation to pay them?

The SPEAKER. This bill expressly prohibits that.

Mr. BECK. It is prohibited in this bill?

The SPEAKER. This bill itself says so.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Committee on Appropriations should report a clause making an appropriation for the purpose the gentleman indicates, he could make the point of order on it that there was no law for it, but, on the contrary, a law against it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read section 11 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained.

Mr. NIBLACK. That is a limitation on the act itself, and goes no further. I suppose I have a right to differ from the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must raise the point of order that the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. That is a very delicate point for the Chair to rule upon. While the Chair does not possibly see how there can be any difference of opinion, it is not for him to determine that the gentleman does not make the appeal in good faith.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair has determined that appeals which have been made heretofore at times were dilatory.

Mr. WOOD. The Chair rules that an amendment substituting a salary for these officers would not be in order?

The SPEAKER. Of course not; that would not be any more in order than the most remotely imaginable thing would be.

Mr. WOOD. Upon what ground?

The SPEAKER. Because it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Might not a motion properly be made to strike out the section prohibiting the payment of these officers?

The SPEAKER. The language is so broad——

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the section which prohibits the payment of the officers now existing or those created by this act were stricken out, then might they not be paid their salaries?

The SPEAKER. It would have to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If I am not mistaken the Speaker has frequently ruled that where an amendment could be legitimately made to a bill which would send it to the Committee of the Whole, the bill itself was subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The amendments cannot parliamentarily be made to provide salaries.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It would certainly be legitimate to strike out that portion of the bill.

Mr. COBURN. I must make the point of order on the appeal that it is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to extend the absolute decision of the Chair without the right of appeal, although the point is so entirely clear to him.

Mr. CESSNA. And does the Chair propose to entertain the motion to lay on the table, and a motion to reconsider that vote, and then two motions relative to adjournment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the Chair shall make a decision on any other point of order which they may choose to raise, can that decision be also appealed from?

The SPEAKER. There may be some colorable pretext here. The Chair can of course limit this matter. It would put him in an embarrassing position to say that his judgment shall absolutely be taken without appeal, although it is not possible for him to see in this case any ground for a difference of opinion.

Mr. GARFIELD. But I think the Chair has the right to demand of gentlemen on the other side that they shall say they believe the Chair has ruled wrongly.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the appeal do lie upon the table.

Mr. NIBLACK. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 55, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the appeal has been laid on the table. I do this for the purpose of calling attention to the ruling of the Chair in the Utah case. If I am wrong about this matter, I have been misled by what I understood the Chair to rule on that occasion. I ask that the language of the Chair in deciding that case be read; and then I will not struggle further about this question.

Mr. CESSNA. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to have it read.

Mr. CESSNA. All right; if the Chair wants it read, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana sends to the Clerk's desk the decision of the present occupant of the chair upon a bill concerning the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. They would not be germane. Any bill that can be considered in the House, as against the point that it should go to the Committee of the Whole, cannot have a germane amendment made to it appropriating money. The point is whether, if this bill is allowed to be considered in the House, an amendment affixing different salaries to the offices from what the committee proposes is not germane. The Chair does not wish to put himself in this attitude, that a bill shall be considered in the House, as against the point that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, and then exclude an amendment which would be obviously a germane amendment to the bill. Suppose for one moment—and the Chair invites the attention of the chairman of the committee to this—suppose for one moment that, where a bill reports certain fees and emoluments to be allowed to the assistant attorney, some gentleman proposes double those fees and emoluments, on what ground can the Chair rule that out as an amendment not germane?

Mr. MCKEE. Then I contend that in all cases we shall have a strict construction of this rule.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair has been trying to do for the past three months—to give a very strict construction to the rule. And the Chair begs the attention of the House to this point, that any bill which may be legitimately considered in the House, as against the point that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole, cannot have a germane amendment appropriating money or property, and any amendment of that nature would therefore be ruled out at once. And that is one of the touch-stones whereby to test the rule, that if a bill, even against the apparent wording of the text, is open to a germane amendment making an appropriation, the bill becomes obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. MCKEE. Then we can hardly introduce any bill that touches in any way upon any office but it may be ruled that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The rule simply is, that the Committee of the Whole shall first discuss the bill. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MCKEE] will observe that this is merely as to the process, the parliamentary process, not affecting the merits of the bill at all. The Chair has no right to rule, and does not desire to rule in any way at all, touching the provisions of a bill. He merely rules as to the parliamentary process to which it shall be subjected. And the Chair thinks, after having looked at the matter carefully, that this bill is unquestionably liable to the point of order, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPEER. What is the date of that?

Mr. NIBLACK. March 5, 1874.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is really quite pleased to see how accurately he made the distinction in that decision. It is precisely what he would reaffirm this moment. There was no clause whatever in the Utah bill excluding the idea of taking money from the Treasury. It left it broad open to any kind of increase, the new marshals to be paid exactly the same amount of fees the then existing marshals were. The two bills were entirely different in scope and purpose. Were that bill again before the House the Chair would again send it to the Committee of the Whole; and according to the line of distinction in that decision, he is bound to have this bill considered in the House.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say one word, not upon the eleventh section, but upon the seventh section of the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. The rules provide that all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in the Committee of the Whole. We have by the sundry civil appropriation bill made appropriation of $3,000,000 for jurors, witnesses, and other expenses of suits in United State courts. Section 7 of this bill provides that the district and circuit courts shall have, exclusively of courts of the several States, jurisdiction of these new crimes and offenses thus created; and all these expenses for witnesses and for other purposes must be paid out of the appropriation already made generally for the courts. Large sums of money must necessarially be paid out of the general appropriation for judicial expenses to carry on this new class of cases over which the United State courts are to have exclusive jurisdiction by this bill. That is the point which I wish to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, if he heard the construction given to the new rule when it was first introduced, will remember the distinction there was between that which requires an appropriation and that which may involve an appropriation. You may introduce a new rule of evidence in pension cases. The result of that new rule of evidence may be to increase the list of pensioners, but it is not liable to the point of order. It may ultimately involve an expenditure, but it does not require it. So this may involve an expenditure, but it does not reqnire it. The distinction is very wide.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. COBURN. The time that has been occupied in getting ready to go into the discussion of this bill seems to render it almost impossible we should go on further this evening. Perhaps no more momentous and important measure has been submitted to this session of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COBURN. Several gentlemen wish to present amendments this evening, and I will yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Indiana yields to me to offer the following amendments to be printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in section 13, line 20, after the words "habeas corpus," the following words: "in such insurrectionary district or districts wherein the President deems such powerful and armed combinations to exist."

Add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 14. This act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that the first amendment is offered as a matter of greater caution. The section now only allows the habeas corpus to be suspended in those insurrectionary districts where organized and armed bands exist so numerous and powerful as to be able by violence to overcome the constituted authorities of the State. And lest there should be any mistake about it I move the amendment. The new seetion limits the time in which the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended, and I have taken the words from the old act of 1792, which was passed in the time of Washington for the suppression of the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania. It was an act—

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.

And the words are these:

This act shall continue to be in force for and during the term of two years, and from this to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

It was approved May 2, 1792.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the whole of the thirteenth section of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. COBURN. I admit no more amendments than those two which are offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to have my amendment read.

Mr. COBURN. I do not allow those amendments to be read if it is to come out of my time. I do not desire to have my time consumed in the reading of various amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must dispose of his time as he sees fit.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope my amendment will be allowed to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the thirteenth section of the bill the following:

That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1871, be, and the same is hereby, revived and re-enacted and continued in force until the close of the next regular session of Congress, and no longer.

Mr. COBURN. I now enter a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will yield to me I desire to move——

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the gentleman from Michigan makes the motion, I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman managing this bill.

Mr. COBURN. I do not yield to the gentleman from Ohio, but to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. At the request of many members of this House, who for over twenty-nine hours have been constantly sitting here, and of many others who during a large portion of the time have been here without sleep, and without food except such as they could procure at the restaurant, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Before that motion is put, if my friend will give way to me, I ask consent to give notice of an amendment which I wish to offer to the bill—to strike out the first, second, and fourth sections of the bill—without which amendment I cannot support it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana admit the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to be pending?

Mr. COBURN. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman in charge of the bill. It is exceedingly important that some arrangement should if possible be entered into in regard to the time when the vote should be taken on it, that we may know what we have to expect.

Mr. CESSNA. I object to any arrangement being attempted in the present temper of the House. I think such an arrangement may be better made to-morrow when we come up here in fresher condition than now.

Mr. CONGER. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio I will say that I attempted in conversation with gentlemen on the other side of the House and with our own friends to arrive at some conclusion as to the time to be occupied in the discussion of the bill. But they were not prepared to say what length of time they might want, and were disposed as we are on this side to leave that to the progress of events to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As to that I will say that I do not think they deserve much time on the other side, because they have sinned away the day of grace here by keeping us up all night.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to remind the House that we have but two days this week and two days next week for all our public business; and if we are to adjourn now, to go into this discussion to-morrow without any limitation, with the probability that no vote can be reached until the next day on this bill—and when the question of engrossment comes the gentleman knows what will then happen—I do not think it would be possible to touch an appropriation bill this week, or any other business. We have gone so far without any consultation as to this that we ought to have it now, if ever.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I would suggest that a great deal of time would be saved if an evening session were held to-night, for the purpose of discussion only, on this bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. We are all too much worn out.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Perhaps an hour to-morrow might be fixed, when the vote would be taken if we have an evening session to-night. There are gentlemen who desire to speak who would as soon speak to-night as to-morrow. And if an evening session was set apart for discussion on this bill without any vote on it, no advantage would be given to anybody, and it would certainly save time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, and others objected.

Mr. CESSNA. I demand the regular order of business and insist that a vote be taken on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say a word as to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.]

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have objected to that proposition, and there is no use in discussing it now.

Mr. COBURN. The Committee on Military Affairs had to-night assigned to it for its business; and I will ask whether, if the House adjourns now, it will vacate that privilege of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The committee would necessarily lose its session. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has moved that the House adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. CONGER; and on a division there were—ayes 130, noes 33.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I call for tellers. A great many gentlemen had not time to reach their seats, and may have been counted on both sides.

Tellers were not ordered; only three members voting therefor.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m., Thursday, February 25) the House adjourned until eleven o'clock a. m. on Friday.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BARBER: Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the improvement of Kewaunee Harbor, Wisconsin, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BIERY: The petition of 210 artisans and workingmen of Allentown, Pennsylvania, for Government aid to the Texas and Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. BLAINE: Resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking extension of time for the construction of the railroad from Lake Saint Croix to Superior and Bayfield, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BUNDY: Two petitions of citizens of Lawrence County, Ohio, for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties made in 1872 and against a duty on tea and coffee, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of women of Massachusetts, for restrictive legislation in regard to the manufacture and use of alcohol, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GLOVER: Resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, in favor of pensions to survivors of the Mexican war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HATHORN: The petition of Helen M. Bishop, for a pension, to the same committee.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of citizens of Macon County, Tennessee, for extension of a post-route to Red Boiling Springs, Macon County, Tennessee, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, memorial of Thomas H. Reeves, of Jonesborough, Tennessee, concerning compensation as member of Congress from the State at large to the Forty-second Congress, to the Committee on Elections.

Also, the petition of Thomas Livesay, of Putnam County, Tennessee, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of the bill to equalize bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STORM: Resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of the bill to equalize bounties, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan: The petition of citizens of Wayland, Michigan, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of 54 citizens of Berlin, Mahoning County, Ohio, for a protective rate of import duties upon all articles that are or can be produced within the United States, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of Logan O. Smith, of Saint Mary's County, Maryland, for the establishment of a post-office at Scotland, on the mail-route from Leonardtown to Ridge, in Saint Mary's County, Maryland, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. COX: The petition of George T. Lovell, to have his claims for insurance adjudicated under the Geneva award, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HURLBUT: The petition of C. O. Parsons and others, of McHenry County, Illinois, for increase of duty on lead and flaxseed, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of citizens of Clearfield and Centre Counties, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties made in 1872 and for the passage of the currency bill of Hon. W. D. KELLEY providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds, to the same committee.

By Mr. MARSHALL: The petition of citizens of Gallatin County, Illinois, for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ROSS: Resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of equalization of bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of 43 citizens of Muskegon County, Michigan, for a bounty of $200 to every Union soldier and sailor, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. SARGENT. Before proceeding to other business, I desire to have an error corrected in the bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, so that the bill may go to the other House in proper form. I call attention to a verbal error made last night. The Senator from Vermont who offered the amendment to the Colorado bill agrees with me that this is a verbal error. "Eighteen hundred and seventy-five" is used instead of "1876" in the New Mexico bill. It is provided that the election shall take place in 1876 and it was intended to make the provision in the New Mexico bill; but, by an error, it was engrossed "1875." I ask that the Secretary be authorized to correct this error in the engrossment of the amendments to the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the correction will be made.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know what the effect will be. I should like to look into it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is merely a clerical error that is to be corrected.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently said: On examination I find the amendment all right, and I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Clerk is authorized to make the correction.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. No. 4837) for the relief of Charles A. Luke—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance"—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 4472) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to defend certain suits against David R. Dillon—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 4573) to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 4839) for the relief of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Sheppard, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses—to the Committee on Printing.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound in quarto form one thousand copies of each of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the final reports of the geological survey of the Territories, for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there shall be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874; five thousand for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed four thousand copies of the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1874; one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, two thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and one thousand copies for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the credentials of Hon. Samuel J. R. McMillan, chosen by the Legislature of Minnesota a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of Alonzo F. White, Bowman Garrison, and very many other soldiers and sailors of different towns in Pennsylvania, urging the immediate passage of a law providing for the equalization of bounties, by the provisions of which, as they set forth, an unjust discrimination in reference to bounties under existing laws will be remedied, and to which the attention of the Senate and House of Representatives is most respectfully requested. As a bill has been reported on the subject, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a petition of citizens of New Buffalo, Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that point; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that $200 in legal-tender notes be granted to each soldier who served in the late war, instead of one hundred and sixty acres of land; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONOVER presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying that mail routes 6454 and 6457 be discontinued and others established in their stead; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of Lewis Burt and other citizens of New York, asking for a prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the Territories and the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4841) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of ten thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1874; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TERMINATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A day or two since I entered a motion to reconsider the passage of Senate joint resolution No. 19. I now ask that the motion to reconsider and the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can have its reconsideration acted on, and then after the reconsideration it can be committed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I entered a motion to reconsider, and that can be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. There has been no vote to reconsider. I merely move that the motion to reconsider and the joint resolution be referred to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question in that form.

Mr. SCOTT. Is that the joint resolution relating to the treaties containing the "most favored nation" clause?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. The desire is to refer the resolution again to the committee?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. All right.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3891) relieving the political disabilities of Edward Booker, of Henry County, Virginia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4321) removing the political disabilities of John Withers, Joseph F. Minter, and William Kearney, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1331) to remove the political disabilities of Robert W. Johnson, formerly of Arkansas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4814) to relieve Charles H. Smith, M. D., of Richmond, Virginia, and James M. Hawes, of Covington, Kentucky, of all political disabilities, to report it with an amendment striking out the name of Smith from the bill. I am am unable to find any petition in favor of Smith, and we therefore are not disposed to report in his favor at this time. We therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the name of Smith, and leaving it stand as to Hawes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4562) removing the political disabilities of Beverly Kennon, of Virginia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1260) to remove the political disabilities of James M. Quarles, of Nashville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas T. Fauntleroy and Charles H. Williamson, citizens of Virginia, to report it favorably as to Fauntleroy, with an amendment striking out the name of Williamson. We think that Mr. Williamson is not entitled to have his disabilities removed. He was dismissed from the service for leaving his duties without notice, or something of that character, so that he does not fall within the rule the committee is disposed to make.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4685) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use his discretion in the selection of material for the construction of a public building at Atlanta, Georgia, to report it without amendment, and as it will take but a moment to read it, and as I have no doubt every Senator will be in favor of granting all that is asked for in the bill, I request its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is due to all the committees that each one should have its part of the morning hour, and that we should all take our turn with business. I feel it to be a duty to insist on things taking their regular order; but as this bill has been read, if it is not to be made a precedent, I will not insist on the objection I ought to have made a little earlier.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to understand when this bill is acted on what reasons there are for it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will not insist on its being acted on now if it is objected to.

Mr. CONKLING. There are public buildings in my State as to which we cannot get this done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, The building was directed to be constructed of brick. At Atlanta the brick are of poor quality. They are made of clay that crumble and decay in a short time.

Mr. CONKLING. Was it directed to be constructed of brick?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes. It is found also that stone of good quality can be procured at a much cheaper rate than these brick.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection if that is it. I thought it was another thing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No objection being made, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I recollect, the appropriation for that building was a limited one.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does this change the limit of the appropriation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It does not,

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not sure as a matter of law that it does not.

Mr. CONKLING, (to Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont.) Are you sure? This is a very quick way of doing things. It is committed to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and then all acts and parts of acts which might impinge upon that, for that is the meaning of it written in plain language, are repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That gives him an unlimited discretion. He can buy marble at $100 a pound if he wants to. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not ask action upon it if there is any doubt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4813) to authorize the removal of the bronze fountain by Rhinehart from the lobby of the city Post-Office, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. There is on the Calendar a bill for the relief of Mr. F. V. Hayden, the Government geologist, which I think if the Senate will hear read they will agree to the present consideration of. The bill ought to be passed immediately, and I think when they hear it read all Senators will agree to it.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In pursuance of what I said I think everything ought to take its turn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If objection is made, the bill cannot be considered now.

Mr. BAYARD. May I suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont that the bill was reported about ten days ago, and I think if he will read it he will approve its object. As it is a Senate bill, unless it be passed in time for the action of the other House the proposed relief for this worthy man will be entirely lost. It will require no debate. I think the reading of the bill and a mere statement of the case will satisfy the Senate that it is a case in which relief should be at once granted. It will take but one moment. I feel that it would be an act of beneficence to an individual and of justice on the part of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator does not understand my position. In making these objections I am not objecting to the merits of any of the bills that are presented. I am only speaking in the interest of fair play in the Senate to have cases considered in their turn; but if the Senate wish to consider this bill under these circumstances or any other, I am not going to stand here alone to insist upon the regular order. I withdraw the objection and ask the Chair to put it to a vote whether the Senate will proceed in this way, and that will relieve me from all further responsibility.

Mr. OGLESBY. Are reports of committees in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order, but the Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a certain bill. Objection was made and that objection has been withdrawn. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SARGENT. It is simply a bill for the relief of Mr Hayden, allowing a small amount of money which was taken by highway robbers from his clerk in Montana while traveling in a stage-coach.

Mr. CLAYTON. I must object. There are other meritorious bills on the Calendar quite as meritorious as this.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I renew it.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4765) granting a pension to Emillia O. Black, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4769) granting a pension to Abraanna L. Dunn, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1265) relating to the promotion of rear-admirals on the retired list of the Navy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4754) granting a pension to Betsey A. Eaton, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4786) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah B. Howe and Mrs. Mary Cranston, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3021) granting pensions to the widows, children, dependent mothers and fathers, or orphan brothers and sisters of those soldiers who were murdered by guerrillas at Centralia, Missouri, in 1864, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4764) granting a pension to Sarah A. Woodworth, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4782) granting a pension to Ansel Thayer, of Braintree, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3709) granting a pension to William H. H. Buck, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3692) granting a pension to Harriet W. Wilkinson, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4727, to do an act of justice to a worthy man.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take up a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the bill?

Mr. LEWIS. House bill No. 4727, to pay Mr. Wright, contractor for sweeping the streets of this city.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will lead to debate.

Mr. LEWIS. If there is any debate, I think it will come from the other side. If this bill is not passed, it will be an act of injustice to a worthy man, who has performed his contract well and honestly carried it out in good faith; and unless he is paid he is utterly ruined by withholding from him what is justly due him. I hope the Senate will take up this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take up the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the bill read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. No. 4727) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does that require unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does; the bill was read for information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not up yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to it unless it can be considered without debate. I understand it will lead to debate.

Mr. CONKLING. I want the Senator from Ohio to give me one moment to discharge my duty about this matter. I do not know this applicant at all or who he is, but another person that I do know came to me yesterday and made a statement of the facts in this case which if correctly made would appeal to every Senator. This man has advanced from his own pocket the money with which this thing has been done. He cannot get that back nor any part of it, it is stated to me, as the law stands. He has been borrowing money at a ruinous rate of interest by the month, as I am told, and it is a case of extreme hardship. The form of the bill I know nothing about, and I do not know personally about the merits; but some one came yesterday and acquainted me with a state of facts which if it be the real state of facts summons every member of the Senate to give some attention to this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a statement of the District Commissioners from which it is manifest that if this bill passes, there is no reason for opposing other claims which have now been satisfied by the 3.65 bonds. It is therefore a matter of grave importance, and I make this opposition after having read the communication of the commissioners of the District, signed by them, calling attention to the importance of the principle involved here.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to one thing in this matter. I read the statement of the commissioners too, and I know a good deal about this thing, inasmuch as Colonel Wright I knew formerly, and he has talked to me a great many times about it, and others have too. I think the Senator will find when he examines the contract which was made for this sweeping that the commissioners in making their report have made a very great mistake. I presume the Senator from Virginia has a copy of the contract.

Mr. LEWIS. I have a copy of the contract here, and I venture the assertion that there is no Senator on this floor who will take that contract and read it and then say that it is not a simple act of justice to Mr. Wright to pay this money. I know nothing about Mr. Wright except that the bill was sent to our committee and we examined it thoroughly at four different meetings of the committee, and every member of the committee was for paying Mr. Wright. The commissioners sent a communication to us which we examined thoroughly, and I say here to-day that there is nothing in it, and one of these commissioners acknowledged to me here in my seat that he had not read the contract.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time, and objection is made by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I desire to say——

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the pending order and all others be laid aside, and that this bill be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the Senator that that would be a violation of the order of the Senate in the morning hour.

Mr. LEWIS. I shall have a right to do it when the morning hour passes?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the morning hour.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well. I will call it up then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4800) granting a pension to John H. Looby, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 712) to enable disabled soldiers to receive money commutations upon orders for artificial limbs that are dated on or before June 16, 1870, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3884) granting a pension to Mary C. Toy, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3719) granting a pension to Mathew B. Whitacre, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3720) granting a pension to Charles C. Haight, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4801) granting a pension to Micajah Stout, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4777) granting a pension to James A. Forgey, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4767) for the relief of Ferdinand Monti, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4771) granting a pension to Charles A. Draher, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4329) granting a pension to William H. Small, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4755) granting a pension to William Lyon, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4763) granting a pension to Lafayette Briggs, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3683) granting a pension to Melissa Rankin, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 965) granting a pension to Samuel Purcell, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 695) granting a pension to Sue Bradley Johnson, widow of General G. L. Johnson, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2586) granting a pension to Woodson Powers, have instructed me to report the same back and recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed. There is a House report in the case unfavorable to the allowance of the pension; there are no papers supporting the claim; and we do not understand how the bill passed the House of Representatives under these circumstances. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Judiciary, to whom was was referred the bill (S. No. 4) to protect persons against inveigling from abroad, kidnaping, forcible constraint, or involuntary service, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of J. M. Stone, William M. Compton, and W. C. McAlexander, sureties on the bond of B. B. Emory, deceased, late collector of internal revenue of the third district of Mississippi, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. MORTON. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections, with an amendment, and recommend its passage; and as it is a measure to which there can be no objection and it is important to have action, I ask unanimous consent now to put the bill on its passage. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals so much of section 127 of the Revised Statutes as requires the Clerk of the House of Representatives to open, upon the written request of either party, any deposition in cases of contested election, after he shall have received the same, and prior to the meeting of Congress.

The amendment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was to add to the bill:

SEC. 2. That section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring the testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant.

Mr. MORTON. The first section simply repeals the law which authorizes the evidence in contested-election cases in the House of Representatives to be opened during vacation. The Clerk says the evidence is opened during vacation by attorneys and others and stolen or mutilated, and it is important that the law shall not authorize it. The amendment is to provide that the ninety days within which testimony is taken in cases of contested election shall begin to run from the day the returned member has served his answer upon the contestant. As the law now stands there is no time fixed when the ninety days shall begin to run.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relative to postage on monthly newspapers relative to agricultural subjects and implements; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS INDEMNITY BONDS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. On the assignment of bills coming in from the House of Representatives a few days ago the bill (H. R. No. 4001) to provide for the redemption of overdue bonds of the United States known as Texas indemnity bonds was referred to the Committee on Claims at my suggestion. I find that at the other end of the Capitol it was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and it is suggested to me that it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary in this body. I therefore make that motion, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask what the Judiciary Committee has to do with this subject? Is it not a mere matter of finance?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. No, sir; they say not. I was under the impression that it was a simple claim of the State of Texas against the United States, but it is stated to me now that there are law questions involved in the bill which ought to be considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the consideration of the bill indicated by him, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask that the communication from the Secretary of the Navy relative to a contract for the statue of Admiral Farragut awarded to Miss Vinnie Ream, which was referred a few days ago to the Committee on Naval Affairs, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It can be considered only by that committee, as a contract has been made for the statue, and the only question is about the appropriation of the money. I therefore ask that that communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understood it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it was entered as referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Very well.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Colorado and New Mexico bills be ordered to be printed by the Senate, with the amendments. I do this at the request of members of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate take a recess from five until half past seven o'clock to-day for the purpose of considering the steamboat bill this evening.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that we had better wait until we reach that part of the day and see what the condition of the business is, and not vote on it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I demand the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Resolutions are in order.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask the consent of the Senate to call up Senate bill No. 720.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ALCORN. I am aware of that, Mr. President; but I trust the Senate will indulge me in taking up this bill, which is unimportant in itself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. State what the bill is?

Mr. ALCORN. It is a bill to authorize an inquiring individual out in Nevada to dig a hole in a mountain. The mountain has been lying there on its "ragged edges," without a hole, since the creation of the world, and there has nothing been found upon its surface which is at all valuable; but an inquiring individual asks to bore a hole in it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

Mr. ALCORN. I trust I shall be allowed to go through with what I was going to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. ALCORN. Do I understand the Senator from Oregon to object?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no resolutions, the Committee on Transportation is entitled to the remainder of the morning hour.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The chairman of the Committee on Transportation does not seem to be in his seat, and I ask that the Senate grant me the indulgence of allowing me to call up from the table Senate bill No. 420.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order, Mr. President. Call the next committee.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask for the taking up of my bill, and I give notice that I shall object to everything until it is taken up.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I rise to ask for information. The Committee on Transportation being entitled to this morning, will it be passed over and the next committee called? I make the inquiry for the reason that I am exceedingly solicitous to get another morning for the Committee on Claims, and I do not wish a motion now to be interposed which will give the Committee on Transportation another morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not give them another morning if we have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Transportation has the rest of the morning hour to-day. If that committee is not ready, the Chair will call the next committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The chairman of that committee is not present at the moment, and I am next on the list; and I know very well he wants to get action on a certain proposition reported from that committee. I ask, therefore, that the resolution reported by that committee be now taken up. It will probably lead to no debate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would say to the Senator from Ohio that the chairman of the committee has been sent for; and while he is coming in I ask that this bill I have referred to be taken from the table. It is a bill objection to which was once raised by the Senator from Ohio's colleague, [Mr. THURMAN,] but I understand he has no further objection to the bill. It was reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and all that is necessary is to concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is that the Senator from Minnesota shall have his business considered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will yield as soon as he comes in.

Mr. LEWIS. I shall object, because I tried to call up a bill awhile ago and I could not get it up.

INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the resolution reported by the Committee on Transportation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution reported by Mr. WINDOM on the 2d instant from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board:

Whereas the power to regulate commerce among the several States, conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, includes the power to aid and facilitate commerce by the employment of such means as may be appropriate and plainly adapted to that end, and Congress may therefore, in its discretion, provide for the improvement or creation of such channels or highways of commerce as will in its judgment afford the cheapest and best facilities for the interchange of commodities between different States of the Union; and whereas it is believed that the thorough and systematic improvement of the Mississippi River, including the construction of an adequate channel at its mouth; the connection of the Mississippi River with the lakes by means of the Fox and Wisconsin improvement and the Hennepin Canal; the speedy completion of the improvements between Lakes Superior and Huron and Lakes Huron and Erie; the thorough and systematic improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, and of the Tennessee River, are works of great national importance and of immediate and pressing necessity, which, when completed, will reduce the cost of transportation, and thereby diminish the burdens now borne by the industrial interests of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in addition to the usual and necessary appropriations made in the river and harbor bill for works already under the charge of the Government, including the Missouri River, the Committee on Commerce be instructed to insert in said bill such sums as in their judgment (having due regard to the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers and of the commissioners appointed upon the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi) can be judiciously and economically expended, during the next fiscal year, upon the improvements above indicated, looking to their speedy completion and the wants of our rapidly increasing internal commerce.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the origin of that resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is reported by the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. BAYARD. When was it reported, I ask?

Mr. WINDOM. That resolution was reported by myself, I will say to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. When, I ask?

Mr. WINDOM. Some three weeks ago, probably.

Mr. SCOTT. On the 2d of February.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it on the Calendar?

Mr. WINDOM. I believe it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope we may have a vote on the resolution; and therefore I waive any remarks I might otherwise make in order to get a vote.

Mr. THURMAN. It is impossible that that resolution can pass without debate. Here are various works of public improvement, to say nothing about the assertion of omnipotent powers for Congress, upon which we are asked to vote definitely to instruct the Committee on Commerce to include appropriations in the river and harbor bill for the commencement of these works without any examination of these various plans having been made by this body, whatever examinations may have been made by the Committee on Transportation. That committee may have satisfied itself that the General Government should commence these works that are named; especially I think that it might expend a few more millions on the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement. It has only given some millions of acres of land and some millions of money to make a canal where there is no canal yet, and it perhaps is very necessary for the welfare of the country, especially in the present plethoric state of the Treasury, when we are to take off taxation instead of increasing it, as I presume, or otherwise this matter would not be pressed—it is very essential indeed that we should embark a few more millions either of land or of money upon that improvement; and so, too, perhaps about other improvements that are named in the resolution and the very names of which are strangers to the majority, I venture to say even to two-thirds, of this Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I for one am unwilling to embark this nation blindly in this way in an expenditure that no man can foresee the end of. That cannot be done within the few remaining days of this present session of Congress. If we are to change the whole policy of this Government from its foundation to this day, and are to embark in an unbounded and unlimited scheme of internal improvement which will ultimately double the debt of the Republic—if we are to do that, let it be done after full discussion, after full information, and upon mature consideration. It cannot be done in the few remaining days of the session of Congress in which we now are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair calls up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 1251) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] moved the postponement of this bill and all prior orders to take up a bill which he indicated.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not present.

Mr. SARGENT. Did not the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania fall with yesterday's session?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate was dividing on that motion and there was no quorum.

Mr. SARGENT. A motion to lay aside a prior order, I submit with deference, does not go over to the next day.

Mr. MORTON. This bill is the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it does go over and that it adheres to the bill until it is disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a motion to postpone the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a request of the Senator from Indiana. I do not expect to be able to postpone the bill in charge of the Senator from Indiana in order to act upon this resolution, but I ask for a very few moments to answer the remarkable speech of the Senator from Ohio. I want no more than two or three minutes to do that.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not object to that provided we first dispose of the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORTON. If the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is the unfinished business, I hope it will be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is merely attached to your bill like a motion to amend. It is a motion to postpone.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate bill No. 1251 in regard to the presidential vote. The Senator from Pennsylvania moved to postpone the consideration of that bill and all prior orders and to take up a House bill in regard to a cemetery at York. The Senate divided on that motion and there was no quorum. The Chair is of the opinion that the question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. WINDOM. I believe that motion is debatable, but I will ask unanimous consent to make a remark in answer to the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Ohio. Is consent granted?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator is to reply to me, I do not want him to reply to me and then I be cut off from any rejoinder which I might think necessary; and I say to him now that a motion to postpone this bill, as I understand, is a debatable question.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. And upon that he can reply to me and I can rejoin if I think it necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I would prefer to talk directly to the question.

Mr. MORTON. If the understanding is that this debate is to go on and that the Senator from Minnesota is to speak and then to be replied to by the Senator from Ohio, I can understand that it may take all the afternoon.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I do not want to occupy more than two or three minutes at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is objection made?

Mr. THURMAN. As the Senator from Pennsylvania who made the motion to postpone is not now in his seat, my respect for him and my disposition to do anything that would be obliging to him would induce me to give unanimous consent to allow my friend from Minnesota to occupy the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio evidently misunderstood wholly the purport of this resolution, and I am not quite willing that we shall pass it over without a statement in reply to his remarks.

He says that we propose in this resolution to enter upon works of internal improvements the very names of which, as I understood him, two-thirds of the Senate never heard. Now, sir, it is a most remarkable fact if two-thirds of this Senate or one single member of this Senate never heard of the channels of commerce proposed to be improved by this resolution. What are they? "The Mississippi River." The Senator from Ohio himself, I think, has heard of the Mississippi River and the improvement at its mouth.

The next is "the connection of the Mississippi River with the lakes by way of the Fox and Wisconsin River," which was recognized as a great natural highway of commerce in the ordinance of 1787. It was then provided that this connection should be forever free, because it was then anticipated that it would be the great line of commerce connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes. So I think if the Senator has ever read the ordinance of 1787 he ought to have heard of that improvement also.

Then there is the conection between the great lakes, Superior and Huron, and Huron and Erie. I think nearly all of the Senators have heard of the existence of these lakes in the northern part of this country. The other improvements are "the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers" and "the Tennessee." I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that a large number of his constituents have heard of the Ohio River if he never has. And certainly the Kanawha has been so often spoken of by my honorable friend from West Virginia and also from Virginia behind him that I think the Senator must be aware that there is such a river as the Kanawha. And as to the Tennessee River, which is the only other improvement proposed, I believe it extends through four or five States of the Union, and connects the Mississippi and the Ohio by water communication with the cotton States of the Southeast. It certainly seems to me that a very moderate knowledge of geography on the part of Senators of the United States would have enabled them to know that there was such a place as the Tennessee River. Hence I say I am surprised when the Senator from Ohio gets up in his place here and tells us that we are proposing some monstrous and novel works of internal improvement the "very names of which" two-thirds of the Senate never heard.

Now, Mr. President, there is not one of these improvements suggested but which will pay back to the Government tenfold the cost proposed to improve it. The whole amount asked for by the Committee on Transportation would be less than four millions for the next year's work; and it seems to me that it is not liable to the charge of extravagance or that we should be criticized for bringing in new measures here which have not been considered. I am anxious before this session closes that we may have a chance to act upon this question. I believe when the Senator from Ohio himself comes to consider it and sees what is to be accomplished by it, he will not be opposed to it.

But I see I am taking time that my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is anxious to occupy otherwise; and giving notice to the Senate that I will at the earliest moment call up this resolution and press it for action, I will not now detain it longer.

Mr. MORTON. I move to lay the motion to postpone on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to reply.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order to lay a motion to postpone on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Indiana that a call for the regular order is all that is necessary.

Mr. THURMAN. How can that be? The motion is to postpone the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That carries your bill with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is Senate bill No. 1251, and on that the pending question is the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to postpone the consideration of the bill and take up another bill. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. And on that I wish to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. Is not my motion in order?

Mr. THURMAN. I shall occupy but a very few minutes.

Mr. President, if the argument of the Senator from Minnesota is no more brilliant than his wit this morning, witty as he is acknowledged to be, it will not require much ability to answer it. I did not say that two-thirds of the Senate were ignorant of the most striking features of the geography of the United States. I said nothing of the kind and intimated nothing of the kind. Therefore the foundation for the facetiousness of the Senator is totally wanting. I spoke of the schemes of improvement, and in respect to them I said that I did not believe one-third of the Senators know what those schemes are. I repeat that assertion. I do not believe it. This resolution proposes peremptorily to instruct the Committee on Commerce to bring in appropriations which the Senator says will amount to four millions for the coming year for the furtherance of particular schemes of improvement. What those particular schemes are, I repeat, I do not believe that one-third of the Senate know. Let us see.

Whereas it is believed that the thorough and systematic improvement of the Mississippi River—

That is the first thing. What kind of "thorough and systematic improvement" is intended by that? Is it intended that you shall make a canal around the rapids below Saint Louis, or that you shall make a canal around the Falls of Saint Anthony, or that you shall simply go on as formerly with your snag-boats pulling up snags here and there? What is meant by that? Is it meant that you shall take measures for the protection of the city of Saint Louis and the harbor there to prevent the river from leaving it, as some have supposed to be necessary? Is that within this "thorough and systematic improvement?" What is meant by it, I should like to know. Here is nothing but vagueness. An expenditure that no man can foresee is included under the simple words "thorough and systematic improvement of the Mississippi River."

Then again in respect to the same river:

Including the construction of an adequate channel at its mouth.

What is meant by that? Does that mean the jettee system, or the Saint Philip Canal, or the improvement of the Southwest Pass? What does it mean, I should like to know? I should like one-third of the Senators here to rise and say that they understand what is meant by that. If they do, I say they are better informed than the remaining two-thirds.

Again, sir:

The connection of the Mississippi River with the lakes by means of the Fox and Wisconsin improvement and the Hennepin Canal.

We certainly have heard of the Fox and Wisconsin improvement; but as to what new improvements are to be adopted to complete that work, which seems to be of perpetual duration, we are left all in the dark.

Again:

The speedy completion of the improvements between Lakes Superior and Huron and Lakes Huron and Erie.

What is meant by that? If it is meant, so far as Lake Huron is concerned, that we are to spend more money on the Saint Clair Flats, I shall not object if the expenditure is necessary; but what is meant by these words?

The improvements between Lakes Superior and Huron.

Is it meant that you are to double the canal around the Sault Sainte Marie? Is that the meaning of it, or what is meant by it? What is the scheme, what is the plan upon which we are asked to bestow four millions of money?

Again:

The thorough and systematic improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers.

What is that to be? Do you propose to adopt here without knowing anything about it a system of slack-water navigation on the Ohio River? If you do, I want to know where you will begin. Will you begin at Louisville? Will you begin at Cincinnati? Will you begin at Portsmouth? Will you begin at the mouth of the Kanawha? Or where will you begin with your system of slack-water navigation? Before you meddle with that river much, I want to know what your system of improvements is and want to know how it will affect my constituency. Or do you simply mean that you are going to work pulling out snags here and there, or deepening the channel over bars here and there by wing-dams—a system which I remember was recommended some years ago and it was estimated that it would cost $15,000,000 for the wing-dam plan alone? What expenditure the slack-water navigation, the dams required in order to create that would involve, I should like to know before we embark upon that enterprise. The same remarks will apply to the Kanawha.

Then as to the improvement of the Tennessee River, what is that to be? Ever since I can recollect, we have been expending money to improve the Tennessee River. The appropriations for the improvement at Muscle Shoals I do not know how large they have been, but very large indeed. Whether more is necessary or not I do not know, or what scheme is in contemplation for the improvement of the Tennessee River.

I spoke of these schemes, these plans of improvement which may or may not be good, which may or may not be advisable, which if we understood them perfectly we might be willing to execute to the extent of our constitutional power; but which, so far as we know, may be wholly unadvisable and may be a waste of money, or if they be advisable ought to be postponed until a time has arrived when Congress ceases to levy additional taxes and takes off taxes already imposed. But now when we are asked to impose $30,000,000 a year additional taxes on the people of the United States, to increase the taxes on what have become necessaries of life to a great portion of our people—now when we are aked to do that and to do that in the few remaining days of this session, I say it is no time to appropriate $4,000,000 blindly without knowing for what it is to be appropriated. I for one do not fear to take the responsibility of opposing this thing. I know very well what use is made of these various schemes; I know that the man who stands at the door of the Treasury and opposes these various schemes is charged with being opposed to cheap transportation and the agriculture interest of the land. Sir, it is an accusation easily made; it is a cheap thing; it has no terrors for me.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is——

Mr. WINDOM. A single word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to postpone the consideration of the pending bill for the purpose of acting on another.

Mr. WINDOM. On that I wish to say a single word and only a single word.

Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. In reply to the Senator from Ohio I will say that he has revealed much more knowledge than I supposed he had, but he has simply revealed what I had no doubt was his true position, entire and absolute opposition to anything that will tend to cheapen transportation in this country; and consequently I want to say in answer to his comments on my wit that my wit was quite equal to his memory, as understood by all the other Senators around me here, when he attempts to quote his first speech in his last.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not at all wonderful that there should be a want of comprehension on that side of the Chamber in the little circle that surrounds the Senator from Minnesota, for he has the happiest faculty of dissemiuating a mist and fog around him of any Senator on this floor; and as to the position of the Senator from Ohio on the subject of cheap transportation, when the proper time comes to discuss that as it ought to be discussed, the Senator from Ohio will express his opinions, poor as they may be, and trust to his constituents to vindicate or condemn them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The motion was not agreed to.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (S. No. 1251) to provide the manner of counting the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to appeal to the courtesy of my colleague to allow me to submit a motion to the Senate and take its judgment upon that motion. Its decision will be my guide in the future. The motion that I desire to submit is that the pending order be temporarily laid aside or postponed for the purpose of enabling me to call up the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

This bill, as it came from the House, has been amended by the Committee on Pensions in this body, and I think it is so shaped now as to command the approbation of most of the Senators. At all events, I wish to submit this motion, and I shall beg the liberty of calling the yeas and nays upon it, so as to know what is the ultimate sense of this body as to taking up and considering this measure at the present session of Congress. It has been here ever since March, 1874. The bill, as amended by the committee, will admit to the pension-roll about five thousand old soldiers and the widows of soldiers, every one of whom is now about the age of eighty years. It will restore a limited number, not more than sixty, I think, to the pension-roll who were dropped.

With this general statement I wish to submit the motion to the Senate whether they will postpone temporarily the pending order for the purpose of allowing me to call up the bill and put it on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] moves that the bill now pending be informally postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill he has indicated.

Mr. LEWIS. I asked a few minutes ago the Senate to take up a bill which I feel very much interested in; but the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] is of paramount importance to that which I was advocating, and I therefore hope the Senate will lay aside the pending order and proceed with that.

Mr. ALCORN. I trust the Senate will consent to take up the bill that the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] desires now to present for consideration. I do not think Congress is aware of the injustice that is now being done to a portion of the people of the country, for example, to the old soldiers of the war of 1812 who were stricken from the rolls, not upon the question of loyalty or disloyalty, but because of the fact that they resided in a certain portion of the country. Within my own knowledge there are old soldiers of the war of 1812, now above eighty years of age, living in the State that I have the honor in part to represent, who are absolutely in want, one of whom is blind, and has been blind for ten years, and who was a Unionist and stood loyal to the Government; and yet, because he lives in the State of Mississippi, he has been suspended from the pension-roll, and to-day he comes and begs Congress that he may be restored. No private bills will be entertained, and his only hope is through this general bill; and what I say of him applies to hundreds of others of these old men, now over three-score years and ten, who are wending their way rapidly to their graves. I ask, Mr. President, that the Senator from Indiana may be heard upon this occasion, and that his bill may be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Indiana in charge of the bill before the Senate [Mr. MORTON] if he consents to this motion.

Mr. MORTON. My colleague has made an appeal to me which it is hard for me to resist under the circumstances, and personally I should be very glad to gratify his wishes on this subject. I am assured by Senators, however, that if I yield, the bill now before the Senate will lose its place. If it be the pleasure of the Senate by a vote to lay this bill aside for the purpose of considering that bill and then to resume the consideration of the pending measure, I have nothing to say.

Mr. ALCORN. That is it.

Mr. MORTON. At the same time I do not wish to do anything which will forfeit the consideration of the bill pending before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order. You cannot entertain an informal motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks for the regular order. The regular order is Senate bill No. 1251.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana can submit a motion to postpone this measure. That would not be in order.

Mr. PRATT. That was the motion I submitted, on which I wish to take the sense of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have only a word to say. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] has brought forward a bill which is thought to be of great importance, and it is; but in order to give place for it, another bill of great importance which has been hanging between the two Houses for more than a year has been kept back, and I wish by asking for the yeas and nays upon this question to know whether the Senate are to postpone the consideration of the counting of the electoral vote bill and to postpone the consideration of the civil-rights bill, which some day or other I hope to get up if we can dispose of this, in order to take up a bill to pay money out of the Treasury to the soldiers of the war of 1812, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude or previous loyalty. I shall be guided of course by the vote of the Senate; and if the Senate chooses to postpone this bill and to take up the other, of course it will be fair notice to me and will relieve me from all further responsibility about the civil-rights bill.

Mr. CRAGIN. I presume that I am in favor of the bill which the Senator from Indiana on my right [Mr. PRATT] seeks now to call up and to displace the one which is the unfinished business; but I can see no sense in point of economy of time or in any other way in displacing the present measure to take up his. As soon as we dispose of the bill now under consideration the Senator can make his motion, and if he can get the Senate to agree to it, certainly he can just as well then get them to agree to it as he can now. Time is being wasted in this struggle for the order of business. If we would go on regularly, dispose of this bill and of other bills, his measure would come up in time. I am in favor of it, but not now.

Mr. PRATT. I have but a word to say in reply. I should feel myself criminal at this late hour of the session if I omitted to seize upon any opportunity, any opening in the business here for the purpose of bringing this bill before the Senate. As the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, I am in receipt of scores of letters weekly from these old men and old women and their friends. I have repeatedly tried to get this measure before the Senate, and I have always encountered some antagonistic measure that was of greater importance, and so it was laid over from day to day until now we are within a week of the adjournment and I am getting desperate, Mr. President. I want to shift the responsibility from my shoulders upon the shoulders of the Senate, and I am thankful to my friend from Vermont for having demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I am willing for one to assume my share of the responsibility of refusing to substitute the measure of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] has charge for the one before the Senate. It is agreed, not by one party but by both parties, that the existing rule governing the two Houses when in convention for the purpose of counting the electoral votes is a rule fraught with danger to the existence of the country, and I for one am willing to take the responsibility of pressing that measure to the exclusion of every other until it is disposed of by this body. We have only six days, and it must be considered by the other House as well as by this. Therefore I am ready to vote against the proposition of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no Senator whom I would favor more gladly than my friend from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT;] but this is a motion that we shall have an extra session of Congress. That is what it amounts to. The bill, if taken up, cannot be disposed of in two or three days. We know there are a great many speeches to be made upon it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have noticed that every time I have made an effort to take up a question out of the regular order, even a question so trivial as that of concurrence in a House amendment to a bill already passed by the Senate, and stating meanwhile that the original objector had since concluded that the ground of objection would no longer justify further objection on his part; and while there was no possible objection to concurrence in the amendment, I have been ruled out by the declaration here that the regular order must be observed by the Senate. Now we are pressed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to take up a bill in his charge. I state to him that I concur in his measure, I favor it, and would be disposed to vote for it if it was regularly before the Senate, and yet I must, out of respect for the judgment of the Senate, heretofore repeatedly expressed, vote against his motion to interject the measure he submits against the regular order. If I vote for his proposition now in this irregular way, I am voting that the Senate was wrong in rejecting my effort to have the Senate consider irregularly the measure I urged. I deferred to the judgment of the Senate before against taking up a bill vital to many citizens of Michigan and which I am anxious to have considered and passed before the end of the session. I am therefore compelled to vote against the proposition of the Senator from Indiana at this time and against my convictions in respect to the merits of his bill; but I feel that my higher duty is to stand with the majority of the Senate in the support of the pending measure, which involves broader interests than the one suggested by my friend from Indiana, which will have my support when regularly up for consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not approve the motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.] I intend to vote against it myself; and my purpose in rising is to say to the Senator from Vermont who has charge of the civil-rights bill that if this motion prevails and the pending order is disposed of I will vote not to take up the bill in charge of the Senator from Indiana who makes this motion, but I will vote to take up the civil-rights bill if the Senator from Vermont having charge of it shall make that motion. I think, however, that the pending order should not be postponed for any bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I feel a very decided interest in some at least of the provisions of the bill which the Senator from Indiana proposes to take up. That bill with certain amendments will receive my very cordial support, and I shall be very glad if there shall be an opportunity in which we can consider and pass it; but I am constrained by the condition of things which we find existing, and I believe it my duty to the country to vote against the motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] will prevail. The bill which is the pending order can very well be dispensed with; the other cannot be. If you are ever going to do justice to the old soldiers now is the time. If this Congress adjourns without doing them that justice, many of them will go to their graves without ever having had their services recognized, and it seems to me if ever there was a case where a bill was entitled to precedence it is this one. I have no speech to make upon it; I only desire to say that I hope we shall have a test question on it and see who are the friends and who are the enemies of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I am prepared when the opportunity is afforded to vote for the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT;] but I think there are other measure of paramount importance to that at this time. While I am willing to do justice to the old soldiers of 1812, I should like to do justice also to the soldiers of the late war by the adoption of a bill for the equalization of bounties which has passed the House of Representatives and is awaiting our action. I think if we are going to enter into this bounty business and do justice to the soldiery, we are called upon to do justice to the soldiers of the late war as well as to the soldiers of 1812. I regard the pending order as being paramount to all these questions, although they are of great importance.

Mr. LOGAN. I know it is rather an ungracious thing to vote against the desire of my friend from Indiana. I should certainly be pleased to vote with him on almost any question; but I now give notice to the Senate that I am ready to go on with the pending order. I have refrained making a motion this morning that I said I would make for the reason that I think this a very important question. I now say, however, that I will antagonize the bounty bill with any question that comes before the Senate, except the regular order. That I will not antagonize with the bounty bill; I deem it about as important as anything else.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One remark has fallen from my honorable friend from Kentucky which leads me to say a word. In no sense whatever can the vote which we give here indicate our judgment upon the merits of the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.] Whether I am for it or whether I am against it, is not involved at all in this motion by any possible parliamentary necessity or as a matter of fact. It is a question of the order of business, the importance of which is just this: If we do not stand by the order of business we lose the control of the business of the Senate, and we who are in the majority are responsible for it, and will be laughed at properly for a weakness unbecoming men charged with such duties.

Here is a matter of paramount and exigent necessity; and the question is, after having entered upon its consideration, whether we will allow anybody to lay it aside. I trust we shall not, Mr. President. My friend near me [Mr. MORTON] feels that it is a matter of courtesy; that his colleague appeals to him as a matter of courtesy. By no possibility is there any question of courtesy in it at all. With all the parliamentary respect and regard I have for my honorable friend over the way, [Mr. PRATT,] he cannot ask it as a matter of courtesy, and I say to my honorable friend near me if he yields to it as a matter of courtesy he yields the discharge of an obvious duty. It is too late in the session, and the questions that are pressing us are of too momentous a character, for us to yield to any personal or private considerations whatever.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has expressed a portion of what I rose to say in reference to the position in which we place ourselves by this vote; but I deem myself justified in making an appeal to my friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] after having made this motion and elicited the expressions thus far made in the Senate to withdraw the motion, and for this reason: he puts it upon the ground that he wishes to throw the responsibility for deferring this measure from his own shoulders upon the Senate. If we all are driven into that position who are besieged by those who have measures in charge, is it not perfectly apparent that all the time of the Senate will be wasted in discussions upon the order of business? If I were to yield to the importunities that I meet with to bring forward a bill, for instance, for which I think the Senator himself will vote when it comes before the Senate—although I am not sure that he will—a bill which seeks to permit thousands of loyal people in the South to present before the commissioners their claims that are now barred by the statute of limitations; if I were to yield to their importunities and throw the responsibility upon the Senate; if the Senator from Illinois who has charge of the bounty bill were to come in and antagonize every measure that is once regularly before the Senate, is it not perfectly apparent that we sacrifice all business for the purpose of getting rid of this personal responsibility?

The Senate is responsible when it has voted to take up a measure; and it has voted to take up this measure in charge of the Senator's colleague, [Mr. MORTON,] a general measure, one involving perhaps the peace of the country at the next presidential election, one that should be provided for; and I think the Senator has now discharged his duty certainly in bringing this subject before the Senate, and there can be no reflection upon him if he will now at once yield and withdraw the motion and permit us to go on with the regular order of business.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, this measure, although repeatedly brought up by me, has been postponed from time to time upon just such arguments as I hear to-day. There is always some question of greater moment to the country than this measure, that should be disposed of before this is taken up. It so happens that for ten months past I never have found a time when it was in the order of business to get a hearing upon this bill, which hearing ought not to consume more than thirty minutes of time, so few and simple are its provisions. But that time has never come, and we are within a week of the adjournment of this Congress, when the bill must fall to the ground, and no action can be had in favor of these old people until the Forty-fourth Congress.

Sir, I have listened to the appeal of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If I could have the unanimous consent of the Senate that some evening should be set apart for the consideration of this bill, or some hour during the day, I would cheerfully withdraw this motion; but unless we can come to an agreement of that kind I must get rid of this responsibility which rests upon my shoulders as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions and place the responsibility of the failure of this measure upon the Senate. Therefore unless we can come to an agreement of that kind I must insist that the vote be taken on my motion.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. SHERMAN. Let us vote.

Mr. MORTON and others. "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. PRATT. If the Senate will give me Saturday morning after the morning hour for the consideration of this bill, say at one o'clock, I will cheerfully withdraw this motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is impossible to make any arrangement in the state of the appropriation and other bills. I am sorry it is so; but the Senator can see that himself.

Mr. PRATT. Very well.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the motion of the Senator from Indiana will prevail. As a member of that committee two years ago I know the bill was carefully examined, and it commended itself to the judgment of the Committee on Pensions; and there has been persistent effort on the part of the chairman of that committee to bring the bill forward. Now it can be disposed of, as he says, in thirty minutes. It is an act of justice to these people, who will soon die off. For one, therefore, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ingalls, Morton, Robertson, Spencer, and Wadleigh—10.

So the motion was not agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. FERRY of Michigan, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4677) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Transportation Routes, submitted an amendment to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on the rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (S. No. 1251) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in line 8, section 1, I move to strike out the words "one teller" and insert "two tellers." The bill provides for one teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House. I see no reason for that. The Senate and the House stand on an equal footing in respect to the count of the votes. This bill goes on the theory that they stand on an equal footing. Although they meet together to witness the counting of the votes, that does not make a joint assembly in which a majority present can control the minority. The Houses do not lose their individuality, but each House is equal to the other in the functions that are to be performed. There is no propriety, therefore, in giving two tellers to the House of Representatives and only one to the Senate. On the contrary, there ought to be a teller of each party, and in order to do that there should be two tellers of the Senate and two of the House. I move that amendment.

Mr. MORTON. The bill is as the present rule is, providing one teller for the House and two for the Senate, but I make no objection to the amendment. I think it is well enough.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio before we vote upon this amendment. In constituting committees in all parliamentary bodies, an odd number is the rule for the obvious motive of securing action; in other words to prevent a tie. Without stopping now to consider the length and breadth of the function of these tellers, suppose it occurs that they stand two to two. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether it is wise to so adjust the numbers that an equal division may occur?

Mr. THURMAN. What the Senator from New York says would have significance if these tellers had any ultimate power of decision; but as the power of decision, and in fact everything but the mere ministerial duty of reading the returns and footing them up is reserved to the two Houses, there is no necessity whatever for constituting a majority of the tellers of one political party or the other. All questions that arise for decision must be decided by the two Houses. The tellers have certain ministerial functions to perform. They read the certificates; and if there is no objection then they put down on sheets, which are already ruled and prepared for them, the votes. That being done, when the work is completed, they add up the figures and hand the paper to the Presiding Officer, who declares the result. Their duties being ministerial only, there is no necessity for having a majority of one opinion or of another opinion; but in order to preserve the rights of the Senate, its individuality, and in order to avoid any errors that might creep in by the superior vigilance that might be exercised by two over one, it is but right and proper that there should be two tellers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The only fault of the argument of the Senator from Ohio is that it proves too much. If really these tellers have nothing to do but foot up a column of figures and state it, the Senator will see that there is little substance in contending that there should be two rather than one on the part of the Senate. I am not going to oppose this amendment; but I still think that if there be any use for the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, it would be a better suggestion if he would so fix a number that it should be an uneven number and should insure an opinion from those who are to give an opinion, even though it may be upon a question so ministerial in the function called for as that prescribed by the Senator from Ohio. If he says there is no significance about this one way or the other, then one teller is as good as forty. If any contingency should arise in which numbers might be important, then I submit that it ought to be as in the case of a committee so fixed that there may be a majority.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the honorable Senator say that as to the function of tellers and the report made by them provided by the joint rule, the votes of two from one House might overrule the vote of the one from the other House?

Mr. CONKLING. I am inclined to think it would.

Mr. BAYARD. I think not.

Mr. CONKLING. I only say as a proposition at large, assuming that they have anything to do, the idea should be to constitute the body in such wise that there would be a controlling part by reason of having the whole body an odd number, rather than so adjust it that there might be an equal difference with no product from the process.

Mr. BAYARD. In this case the tellers are appointed on behalf of each House, act for each House, and not together.

Mr. CONKLING. That is true; and now will the Senator from Delaware tell me what reason occurs to him for having two tellers instead of one on the part of the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. I confess I have not thought on the subject.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I agree with the proposition of the Senator from Ohio that there should be two tellers from each House, that each leading opinion in each House may be represented by the tellers. The tellers have no positive ultimate authority. If we desire to do anything different, I think it should be in the direction of having an uneven number of tellers from each House, as three or five, for example, that each House might be advised by a majority of its committee of tellers as to what should be done. But plainly the tellers of the two Houses cannot act together, inasmuch as the two Houses themselves cannot act together. Therefore, if any opinion from the tellers were desirable by the respective Houses, it could be ascertained by having one teller or three tellers or five tellers from each House, and in no other way. For one I am content that there shall be two from each House, that the leading opinions of each House may be represented.

Mr. THURMAN. My object in making this motion was that the Senate might maintain its right to a perfect equality of power in this important business, and I have but a few words to say in reply to the suggestions of the Senator from New York.

Now, what are the duties of these tellers? The President of the Senate takes up a return, opens the envelope, does not read it himself, but hands it to the tellers. For what purpose is it handed to the tellers? First, that they may read it; and having read it, then if no objection is made, the vote of that State is put down in the blanks which have been previously prepared. But it is the duty of the tellers, when they read such returns, to announce to the joint assembly any defects that they may find. We had an example at the last count where the tellers reported that the returns were all in due form except that one of the seals did not appear to be the great seal of the State. That was a thing which could not appear by mere reading; it could only appear by inspection, and every member of the Senate and House so assembled to the number of between three hundred and four hundred could not make that personal inspection at the moment. The consequence was that that was a duty which devolved upon the tellers. Now, if you have four, you are more likely to have a careful inspection of the returns than if you have a less number.

Then, in the second place, the return having been accepted or not rejected, and the votes being put down, it will be necessary to be careful to see that they are put down in the right column, and when footed up that the footing is correct, and it is more likely to be correct where four perform the duty than where a less number do. Still I do not say that three might not perform it or that two might not perform it; and I would prefer one from each House rather than two from the House of Representatives and one from the Senate. What I insist upon is the absolute equality of the Senate in the functions that are to be then performed. I therefore insist that the motion I have made ought to be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if some gentleman who was in either House of Congress in February, 1865, when this rule was adopted, when I presume there was discussion on the subject, can tell us why the precedent was established, we could better see whether we should change it. If there were good reasons for it then, it might be well to continue it; and I must say that I cannot see any very important results in any way from this change. I thought there were reasons why originally the House of Representatives should have two tellers and the Senate should have one. Those reasons must continue. If they never had an existence, I might as well take the suggestion of my honorable friend from Ohio and insist, for the sake of dignity, or whatever you may please to call it, upon the equal representation of the Senate upon this tally board with the other House. I confess, however, that if we are there represented by a teller, his report will be quite as sufficient for the Senate as if there were two or three or any other number. It so strikes me. But there might have been reasons why there was that disproportion between the Houses. It might have grown simply out of the numerical difference between the two bodies. Something of that kind might have been in the minds of those who drew the rule, and the rule was a joint rule which of course both Houses were consulted about. I can apprehend that it will be no loss to the Senate if it is represented by an additional teller, nor can I see any harm done by increasing the number. Perhaps it might be some assistance in the arithmetical feat of recording the vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, without referring to the debates, a considerable portion of which were printed I believe in a pamphlet at the time, which pamphlet is still within reach, I will state to the Senator from Delaware one consideration, growing rather out of usage than necessity or fundamental reason, why the number of three tellers in all was fixed. The custom has been, speaking now of the two tellers on the part of the House, for the tellers representing the sentiments of a particular State from which electors came to count the vote. Speaking more plainly and exactly, a State had cast its vote for the democratic nominees for President and Vice-President. The usage has been for the democratic teller in the House to announce to the House the returns, to read them at large, as has sometimes been done, or to announce the result of them. A State having voted otherwise, the teller representing the other party read its returns to the House; and when the announcement in gross of the result came to be made the teller on the part of the Senate usually did that. So the work has been apportioned, rather as the Senate will see as a matter of comity or courtesy among the tellers than otherwise; and the one teller on the part of the Senate has been held sufficient to represent the Senate. How far the numerical difference between the two Houses, to which the Senator has referred, entered into it, I do not know; but I rather think that the adjustment fell to that number of tellers because the usage had been to apportion the process, as I have endeavored to state.

Mr. BAYARD. I am obliged to the Senator for this statement. He has given me now a suggestion in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to which I referred before. I wish that no other feeling than that of most gracious comity may prevail between members of the Senate or House in any performance of public duty; but still there is the fact which was recognized in the reasoning which caused the rule to be adopted, that when the vote of one party was to be read from a State in which that party had been successful with its candidate a gentleman associated with that party read it aloud, and when the arithmetical computation of a vote was to be announced on the other side his political opponent rose and read it. That rule was, I think, a wise one. It was satisfactory to all. It was courteous and it was substantially just and protective.

Just so, Mr. President, will the same reasoning apply to the reading of the votes on the part of the Senate. I think from the fact that there can be a representation of both political parties in counting the votes in the board of tellers created by the joint rule, who act for that purpose, there is something that will be satisfactory to the country at large as well as to the representatives in the two Houses of Congress. Therefore I wish now that there would be not only no objection to, but, for very palpable reasons, cause for giving the Senate two tellers, so that each party of the Senate should proclaim the vote and make it perfectly satisfactory, so far as that proclamation is concerned, to both sides. I think there is force in the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and I trust his motion may prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. After the word "votes" at the end of the eleventh line of the first section, I move to insert—

Which certificates shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the names of the States, beginning with the letter A.

Mr. President, this bill goes upon the theory, which I believe to be the correct one, that the function of the President of the Senate is simply to open the returns; that it is not his function to count them; that they are to be counted in such manner as shall be provided either by a joint rule of the two Houses or by law, whichever is the proper mode of providing for their count. His function then being simply to open the returns and to deliver them to the tellers, it ought not to be left in his discretion to select the returns that he will first present. They should be presented in some prescribed mode, and I conceive of no one less liable to objection than the alphabetical order of the names of the States. It would be impossible to select any other method that I am aware of, unless you were to call the States in the order of their coming into the Union.

Mr. BAYARD. Or in the order of their adopting the Federal Constitution.

Mr. THURMAN. In the order of their adopting the Federal Constitution, or of the original thirteen and the subsequent admission of the States; but that is not so convenient a mode as the alphabetical mode. The alphabetical mode requires no research, can give rise to no possible discussion, is perfectly simple, and is perfectly fair.

I therefore propose this amendment, which I consider to be correct and to be in perfect harmony with the whole idea of the bill. Manifestly it ought not to be left in the power of the Presiding Officer to select at his pleasure what returns he will first present. There ought to be a prescribed mode that should settle that question, if for no other reason, to relieve him from any responsibility on the subject or any suspicion as to improper motives in his presentation of the returns. But for much higher reasons than that it is proper that these returns should be presented, opened, and acted upon in some prescribed mode. I hope, therefore, there will be no opposition to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I now move to strike out the last sentence of the first section on page 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the words to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning at line 34, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

Mr. THURMAN. The previous part of the section provides that when a question shall arise in regard to "counting the votes therein certified"—that is, certified in any certificate which shall have been opened and presented as provided in the section—the Senate shall withdraw, and the two Houses shall act upon the objection or question separately; and then, when each House has made its decision, they shall convene again and the decision shall be announced. Then come in at the close of the section these words:

And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

I do not know why these words are put in. I can conceive of no necessity for them. I can conceive of a construction put upon these words that would lead to irremediable mischief. I would be glad, if the Senator from Indiana is not willing that the amendment should be adopted, that he would give us his view as to the effect of these words. If he is willing that the amendment shall be adopted, I will not trouble him.

Mr. MORTON. I find that these words are embraced in the original rule, and form a part of the rule to which perhaps no exception was ever taken. The original rule providing for the counting of the votes says:

And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

It simply provides for the determination of any question that it may be necessary to determine which shall require the concurrence of both Houses, to be determined in like manner, subject to the same restrictions. There may be other questions arising. I could not now anticipate one; I do not know that I could mention one; but other questions may arise, the determination of which may be essential; and this clause simply provides for their settlement in the same way.

Mr. THURMAN. It seems to me obvious that these words in section 1—the last sentence in the section—should come out. The previous part of the section provides all that is necessary for the counting of the votes. All that can properly be done by the two Houses is already provided for. I was aware that these words were in the twenty-second joint rule, and I can conceive some reasons why they were put in that rule; but I can conceive no good reason why they should remain. The Senator from Indiana and I think that the twenty-second rule is a bad rule. It is proposed to abolish it. I do not think it is necessary to preserve this part of it which to my mind is in the highest degree objectionable. Let the whole of it go, if any part of it is to go. There were very peculiar circumstances in the first counts of the votes under that rule. The rule was adopted in 1865, I believe.

Mr. MORTON. February 6, 1865.

Mr. THURMAN. It does not say in my copy when it was adopted. It was adopted in 1865. There were very peculiar circumstances under which that rule was adopted. Several of the Southern States were not reconstructed as it was then said, as some Senators and as the majority of both Houses of Congress thought. I shall not go into the question whether they needed reconstruction at all. They were not reconstructed and the question whether they should vote for President and Vice-President was a mooted question. It was a question whether in point of fact they were States of this Union. That was the question. If they were States of the Union they were entitled to vote, but a majority of Congress refused to consider them as States of the Union.

Mr. BAYARD. Not so early as 1865?

Mr. THURMAN. I am speaking now of 1868, not at the time this rule was adopted. The war had not closed at the time the rule was adopted in 1865, and what States would be in the Union in 1868 was a question that no one could then absolutely foretell. The war still existed, and no one was able to foretell what would be the result after the war should close upon the autonomy of the States that had been engaged in the rebellion. Under those circumstances this rule was adopted, and it was enforced. It was enforced in the count of 1869, and that most extraordinary of all announcements ever made was made by the President of the Senate, that the vote of Georgia should be received if it would not change the result, but if it would change the result it should be rejected! It was in that state of the country that this provision crept into this rule. No reason of that kind exists any more. There is no longer any question what are the States of this Union. Fortunately for the country, every one of them is a State in the Union. There is no longer any expelled sister. On the contrary, you have taken in a couple more yesterday, although they are very young and very feeble. There is no question, therefore, as to what are the States of the Union, and no necessity for this provision being in this rule. On the contrary, if it is left in the rule it may give rise to claims that are utterly inadmissible. We have no provision for contesting the elections of President and Vice-President. This bill does not propose to provide for any such contest. If it did it would be lamentable, nay, wholly, utterly defective. There is no reason, therefore, for opening the door to questions over which we have no jurisdiction; and unless we intend to invite questions and the exercise of a jurisdiction we do not possess, these words should be stricken out of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, in order to make the bill consistent with the action just taken by the Senate, I move to strike out the words in section 3, lines 3 and 4—

Or for the decision of any other question pertinent thereto.

That follows as a matter of course after striking out the last sentence in section 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. As this seems to be a very important bill, I take it that it is well to have the phraseology used as correct as possible. Therefore in line 3 of section 1 I move to amend by striking out the words "the two Houses of Congress" and inserting the words "the Senate and House of Representatives." There is no such phraseology in the Constitution as "the two Houses of Congress." The phraseology used in the Constitution is that which I propose to insert, "the Senate and House of Representatives."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend in line 4, section 1, by inserting after the words "one o'clock" the letters "p. m."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. In line 15 of section 1, after the word "counted," I move to insert the words "by them."

Mr. MORTON. What does the Senator say?

Mr. MERRIMON. After the word "counted," in line 15, section 1, I move to add the words "by them." As it now reads it does not indicate who is to count. It will make it more precise to say "the votes having been counted by them;" that is, the tellers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is the Senator from Indiana quite sure that that would be right?

Mr. MORTON. I scarcely understood the Senator from North Carolina. I think those words hardly necessary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not object to them if they are merely unnecessary, but the question is whether the votes are counted by tellers.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then we ought to settle it. That is the very thing we ought to settle. I understand the tellers are to count the votes. They are to read the certificates and then cast up the votes; and having done so, they hand the result to the President and he announces it to the joint meeting.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The tellers certainly perform the ministerial duty of counting the votes, but whether that is the counting spoken of in the Constitution I think there is very grave question.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I ask the Senator who is to count? The statute will not then provide for that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think there can be any doubt from the language of the rule that it was intended that the tellers should do the counting. The language is:

And said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered, &c.

Now it seems to me those words would be useless. If these gentlemen are to make a list of the votes, unless they count them, how can they be ascertained?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would recall the language of the Constitution to my friend:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates.

Mr. CONKLING. "And the votes shall then be counted."

Mr. FREYLINGHUYSEN. "And the votes shall then be counted." I understand that that counting is really done under the supervision and in fact by the two Houses. I think the bill is a good deal better leaving it as the Constitution leaves it, without saying "being counted by the tellers."

Mr. MERRIMON. Then it seems to me a wrangle might spring up at once as to whether the tellers should count the votes or somebody else. I do not see how the joint meeting could count them unless through some instrumentality.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill is in the language of the Constitution now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understand the object of this act is to execute the provision of the Constitution. I submit the amendment to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to ask the Senator if it is not at least sufficient to use the language of the Constitution? This is precisely the language of the Constitution. The mere addition of the number of votes, done merely as a clerical duty by these persons, certainly is subject to the supervision of the two Houses of Congress, the same as, for instance, in many States where the State constitution refers the counting of the votes for governor to the house of representatives and the senate of the State. They are to count the vote; that is the language of several of the State constitutions; but the vote is never actually counted by the Legislature; it is counted in their presence by the secretary or clerks, as may be. But the meaning of it evidently is that they count the vote. The clerks merely are those persons designated by the bodies to count the vote. Should they make a miscount of the vote there in the presence of the two houses, the two houses would have jurisdiction over it certainly. Hence it certainly means the counting of the vote by the two Houses of Congress, although the mere enumeration of the number is done by persons who are selected for that purpose. I think it is well to leave the language in the bill just as it is.

Mr. MERRIMON. The whole statement of the vote is prepared under the supervision of the joint meeting, but who is to cast up the vote? Is it by the tellers or by the Clerk of the Senate or the Clerk of the House? Somebody must do it. The object of this statute is to execute a provision of the Constitution upon which all legislation is to rest. Of course when the tellers cast up the vote and hand it to the President of the Senate the whole is done under the supervision of the joint meeting. My object is to make it specific.

Mr. MORTON. I submit to the Senate that these words are not necessary. It is possible that something more may be involved in the counting of the votes than the mere addition of the figures. It seems to me it is entirely safe to leave it in the language of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say one word on this question. Somebody must do the ministerial function of counting these votes. They must be counted either by the tellers, or by clerks, or each member must take his turn and count them for himself, which is simply impracticable. Nor do we propose to devolve that duty upon clerks. We appoint tellers and take care who they shall be, in order that the count may be accurate. I think the bill as it now stands without the amendment implies that the tellers shall count the votes. They are to make a list of them. "The votes having been counted;" I think the implication is that they are to be counted by the tellers. In order to make this bill exactly conform to the Constitution, the word "then" ought to be in before the word "counted." The Constitution is "and the votes shall then be counted;" that is, shall be counted right there, in the presence of the two Houses. That is what the Constitution requires, and it ought to be so, perhaps, here. They are not to be counted elsewhere. They are to be counted then and there.

Mr. MORTON. That is implied from the preceding part of the section.

Mr. THURMAN. Perhaps it is. I should think it was; but I suppose the Senator will have no objection to inserting the exact words of the Constitution, the word "then" before the words "be counted." The language of the Constitution is:

And the votes shall then be counted.

I suppose the word "then" ought to go in; and perhaps it would relieve all difficulty to insert after the word "counted" the words "in the presence of the two Houses."

Mr. MORTON. The previous part of the section presupposes that.

Mr. LOGAN. The meaning is just the same although the words are not the same. "The votes having been counted" is just the same precisely as the language in the Constitution. I do not mean that it is verbatim, but the meaning is just the same.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina ought to be adopted to make it perfectly clear. I think that is exactly what the bill now means, and I think it would relieve all difficulty if those words be put in.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question? On reading the rest of that portion of the section it is:

And the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration, &c.

Now suppose you put the language in that the Senator suggests, so as to read, "counted by them," and an error shall occur. They hand the vote to the Vice-President. Have the two Houses then any control of the counting if you put in the words "counted by them?"

Mr. THURMAN. The bill as it now stands I think implies that the votes must be counted by them.

Mr. LOGAN. That is as a matter of course, it seems to me.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator thinks that such an error is likely to occur, where there are four men to one, then that is a defect in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think it is likely to occur, but such things are possible.

Mr. THURMAN. It might; and that only shows that further amendment is necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think so. I think the bill as it is is better. The idea is that the two Houses count the vote. Of course they designate some person to do the mere ministerial office of counting the vote and making the addition, but it is, in fact, constructively done by the two Houses. Now, if you put in the words "by them," they refer to the men selected as the persons to make the count, and leaves them the persons to count the votes, instead of the construction that the Constitution certainly bears, that the Houses count the votes.

Mr. THURMAN. There is a good deal of force in what the Senator says.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that certainly would be the construction. Therefore I do not think the amendment ought to be made.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Illinois has stated so exactly and so fully the view I have of this matter that I am content to give my vote upon the presentation he has made. But yet I venture to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that his amendment would confound together two things different in law and in substance. The office to be done by these tellers, as has been said, is purely ministerial. As my friend said a moment ago, they do the work and the two Houses in fact make the count. They are mere machines. If you could invent a machine which would foot up exactly these columns of figures and state them, that machine would do everything that this bill commits to the tellers, and would do it as competently and as well if it did it as exactly as arithmetic. So you need not necessarily have members of the two Houses to act as tellers. Two of the pages of the two Houses could foot up these figures and present them to the Houses. But does anybody suppose that when you use the word "count" in the constitutional sense you can delegate to two pages the count of those votes? I take it not; but the mechanical, ministerial function, the mere manual act of presenting a total of a column of figures and handing that to the Presiding Officer, you may delegate to anybody, to the Sergeant-at-Arms for aught I know. When the Senator from North Carolina comes now to import into the bill words following those which so nearly adopt the language of the Constitution as these, it may be said, I think it will be said, as the Senator behind me [Mr. LOGAN] has suggested, that the design was to commit to these tellers the whole business, not the mechanical ministerial act of arithmetic alone, but the whole count, with all the attributes of that count as it stands in the Constitution. That is not what we mean. It may well be doubted whether we have power to do any such thing. Congress may do whatever is committed to it as a Congress. Either House or both Houses may do whatever is committed to it or to them; but Congress cannot delegate to anybody else legislative power or any other power which is reposed in Congress, and located there and nowhere else. So we may make a rule which shall commit to the Presiding Officers of the two Houses the duty of scribes and chirographers, to set down and count up and state these figures; but when you come to the last act, to the act accomplished of making the count, in all senses which the Constitution imports, that is the act of the two Houses. "The vote shall then be counted," the two Houses being there.

As I had occasion the other day to say these words are spare, they are scanty. I am not prepared to say that they deny the power to the Presiding Officer, for example, to make this count, so that it is done in the presence of the two Houses; but it is wholly unnecessary to anticipate that question here or to put into this bill anything under which it might be said that had an erroneous footing been made by tellers it had passed beyond the reach of the two Houses to correct, although the discovery might be made before the result was delivered by the Presiding Officer to the constituent body present. It seems to me that as the bill stands it is entirely unexceptionable in that regard.

The word "then," which is suggested by the Senator from Ohio, seems to me not to be necessary, because we are speaking here in the past tense, but I do not think there is any substantive objection to it. So of the words "in the presence of the two Houses." I think they would be surplusage, because the section elsewhere requires the presence of the two Houses. It would be abundant caution, but I see no other objection to it. Therefore I would vote, if it be the pleasure of any Senator, that the bill should be so changed as exactly to follow the Constitution, which I see my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] has in his hand. I have it in my hand—

Shall in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

There is no objection to putting those words in the bill, although I think it sufficiently appears; but when you come to add to the bill words which imply that the whole power of making the count, not merely in a tabular sense, not merely in a clerical sense, not merely that these men are to be authorized as scribes to perform the preliminary process, but that they are to be empowered to consummate and accomplish the whole fact of the count upon which the declaration is to be based, it seems to me that it is an unwise and unnecessary experiment, and may in case of a contest lead to misunderstanding and embarrassment. Therefore I shall not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. With the permission of the Senate I will withdraw my amendment and offer another in lieu of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. I now propose to add after the word "certificates," in the fourteenth line of the first section, these words:

And the votes shall then be counted by the tellers under the supervision of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he did not make a point upon the use of the words "the two Houses of Congress" awhile ago? [Laughter.] I merely suggest this to him that he may not involve himself in any contradiction.

Mr. MERRIMON. In referring to the joint meeting in a statute I thought it better to use the words of the Constitution. Those are the leading words. Those are the words upon which all the balance of the statute turns. I admit that it is more convenient to say "the two Houses," and it may well be used for "the Senate and House of Representatives" after those words are first used in the first section of the act.

Mr FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me this amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is subject to the same criticism as the last. His amendment now is that the votes then be counted by the tellers.

Mr. MERRIMON. Under the supervision of the two Houses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before, it was that they be counted "by them." Mr. President, we have had a bill before us providing how these votes shall be counted, providing that there shall be the interposition of a court to settle questions, and it is argued that that is constitutional because the Constitution provides that Congress shall have a right to pass all laws to carry into effect the various provisions of the Constitution, and that therefore, inasmuch as the Constitution says that these votes are to be counted, Congress may by law provide a tribunal for their counting, to all of which I am entirely opposed. I believe that the tribunal to count the votes is the representatives of the people in Congress assembled, and I am opposed to importing into this bill a provision that that counting, being the only word in the Constitution which regulates the subject, shall be by tellers. I think that the bill is right as it is, "the votes having been counted." We have provided for tellers. We have provided that the two Houses shall be present, the votes having been counted, of course by the two Houses, the ministerial duty, the work, being performed by their agents, the tellers, and I think that anything introduced then may embarrass us very much.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend from North Carolina that I do not think his amendment strengthens the provision or makes it more clear. In reading the whole provision through, the process is so simple that I think it cannot be misunderstood.

Mr. THURMAN. We cannot hear a word the Senator says.

Mr. MORTON. I say I do not think the amendment would strengthen the section or make it more clear or relieve it from any doubt. Reading it as it is here, the whole process is so simple and clear that I think it is hardly liable to misunderstanding. I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why was it necessary, then, if the whole process is so simple, to provide that there should be tellers? Why would not that follow as a consequence without providing for it in the act? My purpose is simply to indicate, by a provision in the statute, who shall cast up the vote under the direction of the joint meeting of the two Houses.

Mr. MORTON. The tellers are to perform the mechanical, ministerial part of the work. They are to make the actual count; and I would not be willing to put anything into the bill which would seem to imply that these tellers had any other functions or any other power than simply to make the count of the vote.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not give them any more power than that. I do not invest them with any power.

Mr. MORTON. I think that is sufficiently clear from what the bill already contains.

Mr. MERRIMON. The bill as it stands now does not indicate who shall count them. It may be the Clerk, or, as the Senator from New York said awhile ago, it may be outside of the joint meeting; it may be the President. My purpose is simply to make it certain, so that no difficulty can arise at any time about whether the Clerk shall cast up the vote or whether the tellers shall do it. Whoever does it does it under the supervision and control of the joint meeting. It is true that the tellers are simply the agents of both Houses, and when they cast up the votes they do it, without anything being said to that effect in the statute, under the supervision of the joint meeting; but when it is expressly provided that they do it under the direction of both Houses, there can be no further question about it; it only indicates who shall perform that ministerial act.

Mr. MORTON. I think that is sufficiently indicated by the appointment of tellers and the statement that "having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates." It seems to me that involves all the mechanical duties that can be required of the tellers.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the provision of the Constitution in comparison with the language that he proposes to amend. Although this bill comes from a committee of which I am a member, I had nothing to do with framing the bill; but whoever framed it evidently did so with a view to comply entirely and completely with the provision of the Constitution in reference to the assembling of the two Houses of Congress and the counting of the electoral votes for President. Passing over it and reading that which relates to the point under consideration, I find this:

They shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

What is the obvious meaning of that particular part of the Constitution? It is that the two Houses of Congress are to count the votes for President and Vice-President the same as the two Houses of Congress pass laws. The business of making laws is in the first instance referred to committees for the purpose of taking it out of the hands of the members of Congress, that the bills may be prepared and put in a condition to be presented for their action. So in this case they may designate persons of their own number or they may possibly designate persons not of their number—to do what? Perform no duty at all, except to take the burden off the House and Senate of making an enumeration of the votes cast for President and Vice-President. Hence they may appoint tellers. These tellers are merely to perform a ministerial office, to make an enumeration of the votes as they are handed to them by the Vice-President and to return to the Vice-President a statement of the count, that he may announce the fact. What fact? As to who has received the greatest number of votes cast for either or both of these offices.

This bill uses this language:

One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, and shall make—

What?

shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates.

The certificates in the hands of the Vice-President handed to the tellers in the presence of the two Houses, or, in other words, handed to the two Houses through the tellers whom they have appointed for the purpose of enumerating or counting the votes.

"The votes having been counted." How? The Constitution says, "the votes shall then be counted." Taking the language in connection the words used here have the same meaning precisely. "The votes having been counted" and "the votes shall then be counted" meaning precisely the same. Then what?

The result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote.

"Announce the state of the vote" to the two Houses as counted by the tellers, for what purpose? That the two Houses may be notified of the count made by the tellers. Then it leaves it for them to correct it if it is an incorrect count. The whole thing is under their supervision.

This being the language of the Constitution, and as the votes have always been counted in this way in the presence of the two Houses, the construction of that language being perfectly well understood, there is no necessity for any amendment; nor do I believe the language proposed by the Senator from North Carolina corrects anything, but makes the phraseology worse than it is in the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I adopt the very language of the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. You adopt the language of the Constitution but you add to it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Why is there any necessity for adding to the language of the Constitution when that is perfectly understood by everybody?

Mr. MERRIMON. To designate the persons who are to do the ministerial act under the direction of the joint body.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill designates them in the fore part of the section "that one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives." They are already designated.

Mr. MERRIMON. Not to count.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, to count.

Mr. MORTON. That is the meaning.

Mr. MERRIMON. It says they shall make a list.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. "One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted"——

Mr. MERRIMON. By whom?

Mr. LOGAN. By whom? By the two Houses of Congress, as the Constitution contemplates, through those whom they have designated for that purpose.

Mr. MERRIMON. I propose to designate the persons who shall do it as agents of the joint meeting. That is all.

Mr. LOGAN. Designate the persons who shall do what? Count the votes?

Mr. MERRIMON. Count the votes.

Mr. LOGAN. They are already designated.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not so understand it.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot understand the English language if it is not so.

Mr. STEVENSON. I concur exactly in the view of the Senator from Illinois. If my friend from North Carolina will read the whole of the joint rule, I think it will be made apparent that the tellers have only a ministerial duty to perform in summing up the tabular statement of the certificates, and that the word "counted," as used in the Constitution and as used in the joint rule, does not apply to the tellers at all. It appears from the joint rule that the returns are to be opened by the President of the Senate, and "said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates." That is a ministerial duty; "and the votes having been counted"—not by these tellers—and when they have made their certificates, some gentleman rises and says, "I object to the count of such a State." Then that question is to be decided by the two Houses, and that is proved by this language:

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision.

There is a clear distinction between the word "count" and the mere summing up of what the certificates show. I concur fully that the bill as it stands now discriminates with sufficient clearness the duty of the tellers and the fact that the votes as certified are to be counted, when the certificates are made out by the two Houses. If an objection is made to any fact stated by a teller, the President makes known to the two Houses the objection; he says, "the Senator from Illinois objects to the vote of such a State," and then the question of counting the vote of that State is to be decided not by the tellers but by the two Houses.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from Kentucky while he is up if a provision is adopted by which you make the tellers the counters, does it not conflict with the provision that the Houses shall separate for the purpose of determining whether a vote shall be counted?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think it throws doubt upon it and renders a conflict of decision more likely to arise than if you leave it stand as it is.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask who is to do this ministerial service?

Mr. STEVENSON. The tellers.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why not say so?

Mr. STEVENSON. It does say so. I have shown the Senator the rule does say so now, as he will see by a reference to it.

And said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled—

Read what? Read the certificates which have been delivered to them by the President of the Senate—shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates.

Mr. MERRIMON. To make a list does not imply to count.

Mr. STEVENSON. They do not make a list by a count; they make out only a tabulated list of the certificates and then they report those tabulated lists as made out to the two Houses in joint session. Then comes the count. Then comes the power to be exercised alone by the two Houses from these certificates as reported by the tellers and as counted in one sense if you please by the tellers, and then if there is an objection to the counting of any vote shown and tabulated by tellers, the question of whether it shall be counted or not is to be determined by the two Houses. That is already provided for.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Kentucky when reading from the joint rule reads from a rule which we destroy by this bill. You find there that the tellers are the counters, but you do not find it in the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana. It is entirely plain in the old rule but it is not equally plain in the bill. I think it means so; I think the language will be so construed; but yet it is not as plain as it is in the old rule which is to be destroyed by this bill, which never ought to be passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator from Connecticut will see that he is mistaken, if he reads the language. The bill is in precisely the same language as the old rule in this particular. The object of this bill is to destroy the force of one portion of the rule which provides that an objection by one House shall destroy the vote of a State. This bill requires the concurrence of both Houses to destroy the vote of a State; but so far as the mere ministerial part is concerned they are the same, and I will read them to show. The twenty-second joint rule says:

One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes, and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted—

Just the language precisely of this bill—

the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected; which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration.

The bill is precisely the same, word for word, as the old rule, except that it changes the proposition which allows one House to deprive a State of its vote. Of course there are changes other than that; but that is the main point in the bill. So far as this particular portion of the bill that we are discussing is concerned, it is copied verbatim from the rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. I confess, sir, that what has been said by the Senator from Illinois and other Senators has not convinced me that I am in error in offering this amendment. The object of this legislation is to execute a provision of the Constitution which directs the counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President; "counting" I say; simply that. I can hardly conceive a necessity to exist for any statutory provision at all. If you are going to provide for the execution of this provision of the Constitution in one respect, why not do it in all? Why not make your action complete? If we desire to make it complete, why not designate all the agencies which the joint meeting will use for the purpose of ascertaining the result? We provide an agency to open the certificates; we provide an agency to make a list of the certificates, for the convenience of the count and ascertaining the result; but the bill does not provide any agency for casting up the vote. I propose by this amendment to provide that the tellers—and I do not care particularly whether it be the tellers or the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House, but with a view to put the matter to rest I propose to provide in the bill that the tellers shall cast up the vote, count the vote under the supervision of the joint meeting. That puts it to rest. No question can arise then.

The bill will be, if amended as I propose, thus:

One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes—

Now the duty of the tellers begins—

and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates.

A list; that is a mere matter of convenience; and then I propose to add—

And the votes shall then be counted by the tellers under the supervision and direction of the joint meeting.

Then it is plain; then the agency is provided and the duty of that agency is prescribed, so that there can be no question or further trouble about it. As it is, the joint meeting might direct the Secretary of the Senate to cast up the vote; they might direct the Clerk of the House to do it; they might direct the presiding officer to do it; they might direct two of the Senators to do it; they might direct somebody outside of the joint meeting to do it. My object is simply to put the question of who shall cast up the vote under the direction of the two Houses beyond any sort of doubt, to make it specific and certain.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that if the Senator would consider the significance of the word "counted" as used in the Constitution he would not insist on his amendment. There must be some tribunal to determine whether a State is entitled to a vote or not. There must be a certain tribunal to determine whether the vote is properly authenticated, whether the proper number of electoral votes are sent.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. This provision does not interfere with that at all——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand.

Mr. MERRIMON. For I have said that the count shall be made under the direction of the joint meeting.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. All those things are to be determined. Where is the tribunal to determine them, and where does it get its authority? There is but one word in the whole frame-work of this Government that bestows that jurisdiction and authority, and that word is "counted." You may look through the Constitution, and the only thing that settles how this important work is to be effected is contained in that word "counted" in the phrase "the votes shall then be counted." Then somebody is to determine what are votes, who has a right to vote. My friend's amendment is, "be counted by the tellers."

Mr. MERRIMON. Under the supervision and direction of the two Houses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But they are not to be counted by the tellers under anybody's supervision; they are to be counted by the two Houses of Congress, and this bill has gone as far as it can go in defining the duties of these tellers when it has provided that they shall make a list of the votes. That is the ministerial duty they perform, and the counting must be left to the two Houses.

Mr. MORTON. I scarcely ever have had any trouble in understanding my friend from North Carolina during the time he has been here, but I confess he is unable to-day to make me comprehend any point to this amendment. I have certainly tried to do so, because I am willing to take any amendment that I think will perfect the bill and I would accept it in an instant if I thought it would improve it at all. My friend loses sight——

Mr. MERRIMON. I am content to take a vote now. I do not want to debate it.

Mr. MORTON. In a moment. My friend loses sight of the different stages in the proceeding, and I want simply to call his attention to them. The section provides "that two tellers shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes." The President first stands up and opens them and then passes them over to the desk to the tellers; "and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled"—having opened the certificates and passed them over, the tellers read them in the presence of the two Houses; and after the tellers have read them, then the tellers "shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates." They make out a list, and that list shows how many votes one man gets and how many another man gets. The list must do that; the list implies that.

Mr. MERRIMON. Who is to add them up?

Mr. MORTON. Who adds them up? I suppose all the members of the House cannot stand up and add them together. The list shows how many votes each candidate gets. And now I come to another stage of the proceeding, and this evidently refers to what has taken place after all has been gone through, and the Senator will see that it refers to the conclusion of the matter; I want his attention.

And the votes having been counted—

That is, after the whole thing has been gone through with and the Houses have separately decided upon any question that may arise—

And the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate.

After you have gone through the whole thing, the two Houses having separated from time to time and voted, a list is made out just as our Secretary makes out a list of the yeas and nays.

And the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate—

Just as the Secretary here delivers the roll to the President of the Senate at the conclusion of a call of the yeas and nays—who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected—

That implies that that is the conclusion of the whole ceremony—which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

That is the conclusion of the whole thing; and in the mean time, before the votes have been finally counted and the announcement made, what may take place? Objection may be made to the vote of North Carolina, and the two Houses separate and vote upon it; and under the rule as it now stands, if either House sustains the objection, the vote of North Carolina goes out, and she is disfranchised—has no more a vote than if she was a Territory. That is what we are proposing to correct. But this is the conclusion of the thing: After having gone through all the stages, determined how many votes shall be counted and how many rejected, the list is handed to the President and he announces the result; that is, the declaration of who is elected, if anybody is elected. I submit to my friend that his amendment does not tend to make the section any clearer or to improve it. If I thought it did, I should accept it in a moment so far as I am concerned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, I propose to strike out in line 15 of section 1, after the word "of," the words "the same" and insert the words "such count." I confess as the words stand now I do not know what "the same" refer to. I take it they refer to the count, and to make it more precise and logical I think the words "such count" are better.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think that makes it any more clear. The words are "result of the same," that is, the result of the counting, and nobody can misunderstand it. I submit that his amendment does not make the thing a bit clearer than it is now or improve the phraseology.

Mr. LOGAN. In the old rule which was adopted by Congress after Congress the rule is "the result of the same shall be delivered." It is the language we have followed for years, and it is better than the language the Senator from North Carolina suggests, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is only a difference of opinion between us on that subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I admit that.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to strike out "the same" and insert "such count" to make it logical, to say nothing of beauty of expression.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERRIMON. In line 17 of section 1 I move to strike out the word "state" and insert the word "result;" so as to read:

The result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the result of the vote.

Mr. LOGAN. All I desire to do is merely to read the language of the old rule, "thereupon announce the state of the vote," just the same language that is in the bill, and it has been adopted by Congress after Congress.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is no reason we should not make it right now. Two wrongs never made a right.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no difference in the language.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is the difference between the "state" of a vote and the "result" of a vote.

Mr. LOGAN. What is it, tell us?

Mr. MERRIMON. The state of the vote may be such that there will be no result.

Mr. LOGAN. Then the result of the vote may be such that there will be no result. Is that it?

Mr. MERRIMON. The state of the vote is the condition of the vote, and there may be various circumstances affecting it by which there is no result; and if the vote is in such condition that there is no result——

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator, if there is no result, how can you state a result?

Mr. MORTON. I suggest that my friend now involves himself in the only reason I have heard him give. The language is "and announce the state of the vote." There may be no result to announce as shown immediately afterward by these words, "and the names of the persons, if any, elected." There may be no election. There may be therefore no result.

Mr. MERRIMON. How can he announce that anybody is elected unless there is a result?

Mr. MORTON. There may be a state of the vote in which there is no election. The bill contemplates that. But now I submit to my friend in all earnestness and candor that he does not improve, it seems to me, the phraseology or the rhetoric of the bill in any respect by striking out the word "state" and inserting "result." I hope the word will remain as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

[Mr. BAYARD addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. THURMAN. I concur with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in the opinion that this bill should not be pressed in hot haste, and I have not pressed it. I agree with him that it would be more satisfactory that this subject should be acted upon at the next session of Congress than now, and for the reason that he has suggested. Had the election that took place in this country last year of members of the House of Representatives in Congress taken place in England and resulted in a victory as great over the administration, the administration there would have been changed just as soon as the result was known. Such a victory has not that effect in the United States. The administration remains for a constitutional term. Yet such an expression of public opinion is entitled to great consideration by the majority here, and imposes on it, in my humble judgment, a duty not to press upon Congress matters that it is quite certain would be rejected by the Congress to meet next winter. Whether this is one of those measures or not of course must depend upon its merits, for in respect to it there has been no expression of public opinion. Therefore, while I admit that this measure is not one of the things that have been decided at the polls and that it must be acted upon according to its merits, yet I say that where there is a serious difference of opinion in respect to it, it would be more becoming and more consistent with the idea of our being governed by the public will that such a measure should be deferred, especially as ample time will be afforded for passing it next winter if it ought to be passed. But a majority of the Senate have determined otherwise. They have determined to proceed with this measure, and we are therefore brought to its consideration; and in its consideration I find the opinions of the Senator from Delaware who has just addressed the Senate and my own on an important section of the bill very far opposed. Knowing as I do the ability, the industry, the research, and the patriotism of that Senator, I never differ with him without doubting the correctness of my own judgment, and yet what he has said has not changed my opinion of the second section of this bill. On the contrary, I think that the point upon which he mainly relies in opposition to that section is not well taken, that the difficulty he supposes can never by any possibility exist.

Suppose the second section were stricken out of the bill and the bill were passed without it, what would be the effect of the bill thus enacted into a law? And here I crave the attention of the Senate, and especially of those who have been impressed by the very grave and forcible remarks of the Senator from Delaware. If that section were stricken out of the bill, then the only provision in the bill for the counting of the votes would be that a return should be counted unless both Houses concurred in rejecting it. That would be the bill applicable in every case. Mark it, Senators; in every case a return should be counted unless both Houses concurred in rejecting it.

Now, under such a law as that, suppose the President of the Senate to lay the return from a State before the two Houses and an objection be made to that return. The Senate retires to its Chamber and a vote is taken in the two Houses whether that return shall be received. The Senate votes not to receive it; the House votes that it shall be received. The effect would be, under the first section of the bill, that that return must be counted. Remember that. Here is a return, we will suppose, just as there was at the last count, from the State of Louisiana. It is presented, opened by the Presiding Officer, handed to the tellers. An objection is made to its being counted. The two Houses separate in order to decide the question. One of the Houses decides to count it; the other not to count it. Then under the first section of the bill it would be counted. If there is another return from that same State, the Senator from Delaware seems to think you would have to go through the same process with that second return that you did with the first, and that if the Houses were reversed upon the second return, as there was not a concurrence in rejecting it, both returns would have to be received and Louisiana would be counted at twice the number of votes to which under the Constitution she is entitled. I submit to my friend that by no possibility could such a thing occur, because when once you have counted all the votes to which a State is entitled you can count no more. It is impossible; the thing is res adjudicata.

The moment you have decided, either by the difference of the two Houses as to the counting of the returns or in any other manner, that that return shall be counted, the vote of that State is given and no other vote from it can be received. Can there be anything clearer than that? Suppose there be two returns from Louisiana, one of them is presented and an objection is made to its count. The Houses separate, and one of the Houses decides that it shall be counted. Would it not be counted then? No one will say no. Then suppose the other return is presented. What is the objection to that? "We have counted Louisiana once; we cannot count her again. We have given her all the votes to which she is entitled; we cannot receive any further return from that State." But now, if by our act we make a difference of opinion between the two Houses equal to a judgment of both Houses in favor of the reception of a return, it is just as plain as that two and two make four that when you have counted one return the matter is res adjudicata, and you cannot count another.

Therefore there can be no such thing as my friend from Delaware seems to suppose of heaping up the votes of a single State and giving her twice the vote to which under the Constitution she is entitled, requiring a candidate to receive more votes in order to elect him than the Constitution requires. I beg my friend from Delaware to bear in mind what would be the result. Suppose we are in January, 1877, and this second section is not a part of the law, but the first section alone is the law. Suppose the State of Alabama, the first on the list, is called, and there are two returns from Alabama, returns from two bodies claiming to be electors, as there were from Louisiana and from Arkansas at the last count. Is there any law that says which of those returns shall be first presented by the President of the Senate? No, sir; and you cannot make any law that will meet that case. It is therefore within his discretion which one he will present first, which he will open first, and hand to the tellers first; and just as certain as that he has eyes in his head, so certain will he know which one of those two returns is the return of the republican electors and which is the return of the democratic electors, and just as certain as human nature is human nature the return of the republican electors will be opened first and handed to the tellers first. Then if the House may vote to reject it and the Senate to receive it, under this first section of the bill it is received. Then the vote of that State has been counted, and there is no question upon any other return, and cannot be. So that the effect of striking out the second section of the bill is simply this: that where the two Houses are divided in opinion upon a question which shall be the true return, the whole thing is determined by the Presiding Officer by the simple fact of which return he opens and presents first. That is the result of it. The whole thing is done in that way. Whichever return the President of the Senate shall first open and first hand to the tellers, where the Houses are divided in opinion, that return, under this first section, must be received, because both Houses do not concur in rejecting it; and that being received, no other return can be considered at all, for the question, as I said before, is res adjudicata; the State has been counted in all the votes to which she is entitled.

It does seem to me, then, that to strike out this second section of the bill is to clothe the Presiding Officer with a power that not one of us I trust will be willing to confer upon him—to confer upon him the power, where there is a division of opinion between the two Houses, to count the votes on that side which he shall see fit first to present. That is the inevitable result.

Again, what must you do where there is more than one return from a State, if you leave the present rule to exist? Why, just precisely what took place at the last count. The vote of three States was thrown out, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and the vote of certain electors from the State of Georgia. Suppose we go on under the present rule and the vote is counted in January, 1877, and two sets of returns come from a State. The House of Representatives vote for one, the Senate for the other. Both go out, under the existing rule, and the State loses her vote. Is that right? Is that a performance of our constitutional duty? We are to determine which of the men who cast those votes were the electors in that State of President and Vice-President. That is the duty that devolves upon us. If there are two returns from two different bodies of men, it is our duty to determine between them which is the true body of men. Can we shirk that duty? Have we any right to shirk that duty? Are we not bound to decide it if we can decide it? Under your present rule you do not decide it at all. One House decides that one body of men were not the true electors and their certificate is rejected. The other House decides that the other body were not the true electors, and their certificate is rejected. Thus you come to no decision. You make no effort at a decision between these two conflicting claims.

That is not right. It may be inevitable under any system. The same thing might happen, I grant, under this very second section, but it provides that you shall consider the votes and determine between them. What, then, is this second section? I feel bound to say this much about it because I suggested this point in the first debate that took place at this session on the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to rescind the twenty-second joint rule. I suggested the very difficulty and the remedy, and I supposed that it was in some small respect owing to what I then said that the Senator has incorporated it in his bill. I thought I was right then and I think so yet. Therefore I have felt bound to make these remarks.

I have said that under the first section of the bill there can be no proper adjudication between two conflicting returns, for the whole thing would depend upon the action of the Presiding Officer, upon the mere fact of which return he opened first. Then something must be done for a case where there are two conflicting returns; and what can you do but to require the two Houses to consider each of those returns and then determine which of them shall be received? They can make no decision to receive one unless both Houses concur. One House has no superiority over the other. If the two Houses differ, one being in favor of one return and the other in favor of the other and are inflexible, of course there can be no decision; but when there are two or more returns from a State, of necessity there must be a concurrence of the two Houses in order to receive one of them. Just as an equally divided court can make no decision, in the same way where there are two returns it has to decide between them which is the true return, who were the true electors of that State as appears by the certificates that have been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is there any different rule of responsibility or right in deciding where there are two sets of papers and in deciding where there is one? The Senator says if there are two neither ought to be counted on principle unless the two Houses shall decide which one is to be taken. Now, if one set of papers be presented in respect of which the same question might be made exactly as would be made in respect of one of the two in the case where there were two, why must not both Houses decide in the same way to affirm that that paper is what it purports to be, the evidence of the vote of the State for President? That is the point that troubles me.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the scope of the question very well, and I think it can be very easily answered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I should like to hear.

Mr. THURMAN. When there is but one return from a State, sufficient respect ought to be paid to that return that it should not be rejected unless both Houses unite in the opinion that it should be rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but if I do not interrupt the Senator or trouble him——

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I think the same could be said where two papers come from the State; only one of them can be the return of the State. One is true and the other is false, unless both may be false. If false, it ought not to be counted; if true, it ought to be. I do not see that the Senator gets out of the difficulty by that suggestion.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it is because my thoughts are very muddy or my expressions are very muddy. When there is more than one return, you are driven to decide between the two returns. If one House says that one return is not the true return and the other says it is, you ought not to count that under the first section in this bill, because upon the very next return the Houses might be reversed and the vote be precisely the same upon it, and therefore you are driven, ex necessitate, where there are two returns, to an affirmative decision of both Houses in favor of one. You cannot apply the rule that you shall take the first return unless both Houses concur in rejecting it, without involving the difficulty which I stated before, and which perhaps the Senator did not hear, that that would put it in the power of the Presiding Officer to definitely settle what should be the vote of the State according to the mere fact of which return he opened first.

Now, Mr. President, if I have made myself understood I have done all that I desired. I have no desire whatsoever that this measure shall be pressed. I certainly have no desire that a bad measure shall be adopted. I do not know any interest that anybody has that a bad measure should be adopted. It is the interest of us all, if we are instigated by what I hope we all are, a desire for the peace of the country and that the Constitution may be obeyed, respected, and executed, to frame such a measure as shall secure its execution according to justice and the right. I know of no other motive that actuates any one of us and I know of no reason therefore why this measure should not be such a work that every man in the Senate can give it his approval. But I do not set up for myself any infallibility of judgment. There may be men who see further than I see in this business, who, perceive difficulties that I do not perceive, and to whose judgment I would defer with the greatest pleasure.

I repeat, therefore, that I am not only willing, but I would prefer, that the decision of this matter should be remitted to the next Congress, where one House will be of one political complexion and the other of another, and where a measure may be matured that would be more likely to give universal satisfaction; for I take it to be almost certain that the twenty-second joint rule cannot stand as the law of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator from Ohio has any just right to say or to imply in what he says that this bill has any reference to parties——

Mr. THURMAN. I have not said so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he has not said so or implied so, there is no just ground that I know of for saying that this subject should be remitted to the next Congress, wherein one party will have one branch and the other party will have the other. If this is a bill which appeals to good men of all parties to settle a troublesome and difficult question for the right and according to justice under the law, and is not a party measure, then there is no reason why it should not be considered and disposed of now. I think I am safe in saying that.

The difficulty that meets us under the Constitution, as it strikes me, is this: The Constitution requires that the vote of each State shall be opened by the Presiding Officer, the President of the Senate. When opened the votes are to be counted. The question on which the whole thing turns, to which our legislation is directed, except mere machinery, is what is a vote of a State? We all agree that every vote of every State ought to be counted. We all agree that whatever pretends to be a vote, or looks like a vote but is not a vote, should not be counted. So the thing which we are to provide for by this legislation is a means of ascertaining fairly and truly, according to the Constitution and the law, what is the vote, the will, of each particular State in the choice of a President. I think no man can question that I state the question fairly. That is it. Now, how are we to do it? In almost all cases in ascertaining not only in elections but in a thousand other affairs what has been done, (because what has been done is the business which the Constitution requires in some way to be ascertained,) a tribunal is provided, upon the philosophy of justice and jurisprudence, which is one single tribunal, and whose judgment when pronounced by a quorum of its body becomes one single judgment. The fault of the present rule is that unless both Houses concur in counting a particular paper as a vote the paper is not counted at all. If a State should send a vote which should be perfect in every respect, conform on its face to the Constitution and to the law, be certified in the way that the law requires, sealed by the seal of the State, countersigned by the governor and the secretary of state, and all that, it is within the power of either House, as the rule now stands, it is true, to say it shall not be counted at all and the constitutional right of the State in question is entirely overthrown in the vote for President. But that of course implies that one or the other of the two Houses, in such a case, has failed to perform the duty which the Constitution and the law and the rule impose upon it. We cannot presume that either House would object to the counting of a particular paper as a vote unless it should have a lawful reason for doing so, unless it appeared in some way that it did not represent the lawful and constitutional vote of the State, or unless it appeared for want of evidence, in defect of execution or certification, or whatever, that we were unable to say what was the vote of the State.

Now, when you reverse it and take it as this bill is, which provides—leaving out the case of double returns—that everything that comes from a State called a vote, no matter if it be from a revolutionary government, no matter if it be from an assemblage of men who have no shadow of constitutional authority but who have got possession of the great seal, or have made another, as in the Louisiana case one of the witnesses swore that the great seals of the State of Louisiana were as plenty as blackberries and made to order, shall be counted. Here you have a paper which on the face of it appears to be proved by the great seal of the State of Louisiana; I take that merely for illustration. It is signed by somebody who purports to be the governor of Louisiana. Very well so far. Now, it may be known to every member of both Houses that that particular paper was really gotten up and emanated from an unlawful and revolutionary assemblage of men who, only a week before the time when the electors were to meet, had overturned the lawful and constituted government of that State, had possessed themselves of the public archives and the public seal, installed a man as governor de facto, as the modern phrase is. There is your certificate. Now this bill says that those votes shall be counted. The difficulty is just as great if not greater then under the existing rule. The rule as it exists declares that nothing shall be treated as the true voice of the State unless the representatives of the people and the representatives of the States, acting separately, shall agree that it is the voice of the State; and when I say that, I do not mean the voice of the State outside of the law and the Constitution, but upon the papers, following the law as a court do. Now when you turn it over to the other side, without you say, as this bill does—leaving aside the double returns, as I say—that whatever does come which appears to be, purports to be, in form, the voice of the people of the State, shall be counted unless both Houses concur in saying that that is not the voice of the State. To my mind the latter alternative is quite as dangerous, if not more so, than the first. What, in my opinion, the Constitution requires is a law which shall provide, for the time being, a tribunal of some sort, which is a single tribunal, which is bound to decide upon the Constitution and the law whether a particular paper which is opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, and which is then offered to be counted under the Constitution, is the vote which the Constitution speaks of.

The Constitution says "the votes shall then be counted." What is a vote? The Constitution does not mean that every paper which a selectman or a justice of the peace may send here shall be counted; but it says the vote shall be counted. What is a vote? The vote, under the Constitution and the law, is the lawful and authoritative expression of the electors of that State, chosen as the Constitution and the laws provide. Nothing else is a vote. That is a question which must be decided. Somebody must decide it. If you are to remit a question of that kind to the decision of two separate bodies, each acting independently of the other, where are you to land? Of course you are forced in that case to one of two alternatives. You are forced to say, as the present rule does, that nothing shall be considered a vote that the two Houses do not agree is a vote, or you are to say that everything shall be considered a vote that the two Houses cannot concur in saying is not a vote; and there you are. You are at loggerheads at once. You might as well institute a court composed of two judges and hold that no evidence shall be received, as the present rule is, except the two judges concur to receive it. That would not be very bad in administering justice, because you would presume that the two judges sworn to administer the law and nothing else would in some case or other agree that a particular piece of evidence offered was lawful. Then you turn that over and say that all evidence offered shall be received unless each of the two judges of your court say it shall not. Well, you can say it is presumable that they will act according to their duty, that in most cases they will concur in rejecting evidence that ought not to be admitted, but still you do not administer justice very well in either way. You must have one single method of deciding the question. You cannot decide it as you do in the composition of these two Houses in the passage of a law, where for public interests the law is not to be changed unless the two Houses concur in changing it. That is a mere check upon the hasty expression of public will and you are left not in a very bad condition if a law does not pass. But here comes the performance of a duty which must be performed in order that the Government may go on. What are you to do? You must in some way, under the Constitution and under the law, have a means of deciding, once for all, what the true law of the case is. Now, in almost all the States, I do not know but that in every one, if a man is reported under the Constitution and the laws and declared elected governor, and another man says that he is elected governor and the man so declared is not, the judicial branch of the Government is called into play to decide, under the Constitution and the laws, which of these two persons is entitled to the office of governor; and upon a proper suit brought and a decision made upon it you have reached a decision, be it right or be it wrong. Like every other judicial decision, it is better for the peace of society that it should stand, even if erroneous, than that the community should be thrown into anarchy. That is the theory upon which all judicial determinations are based. Very well; the Constitution has stopped when it says that the vote shall be counted.

There are two theories upon that subject. One is that the Constitution of the United States does not allow a judicial determination by contest or by suit of any question as to who shall be President of the United States, differing from the constitutions and the laws of almost all the States. Suppose that be so, what then? Why, the law must provide in some way for a consolidated opinion, as I think, of the two Houses, through a committee or in some way, so as to get a definite decision by a distinct body of men upon the question. The other theory is that if the two Houses under the present rule declare that A B is elected President of the United States and C D thinks he is, he has a right to appeal to the courts of his country under the judicial power, which the Constitution declares shall extend to all cases and controversies arising un der the Constitution and the laws of the United States, to determine the question.

I believe, Mr. President, as the law now stands and as the rule now stands, that if at the last election it had been declared in the Chamber of the House of Representatives that Horace Greeley, if he had not died, was President of the United States, it would have been competent for General Grant to have instituted a suit in the circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction, original jurisdiction of all causes between persons arising under the laws of the United States, to get possession of that office, and I believe that the final decision of the circuit court of the United States, or the final judgment of the Supreme Court upon appeal, would, under our Constitution and laws, have been a judicial determination constitutionally made as to the controversy between those two gentlemen respecting the right to this office. Other gentlemen disagree to that idea. They believe, as I said, that the first branch of the proposition is the true one, and that the two Houses, together or separately, or by some consolidated committee, are the final judges. Suppose that were to be so, there would still be under the Constitution the right, as broad as the Constitution can make it, in the courts of the United States to decide any cause or controversy which arose under the Constitution and under the law; and how in such a case could a court refuse to decide, if one man claiming to be entitled to an office brought a suit against another man claiming to be entitled to that office? They could not do it.

But that, perhaps, is a little apart from the present and precise question we have, which goes upon the theory that for the time being, at any rate—of course it does not preclude an ultimate resort to the courts, for an ultimate resort to the courts is a constitutional right under the judicial power conferred by the Constitution; and of course no legislation of Congress could abridge it; but this goes upon the idea, either for the time being or for all time, that the two Houses are to decide. If they are to decide, how is the best way to do it? It has appeared to me, after considerable study of the subject—and I state my opinions with great deference and diffidence as well, in view of the opinions of other gentlemen who differ from me—that the only satisfactory solution of this difficulty, going upon the assumption that the two Houses in some way are to determine this question for the time being, that they must determine it in such a way that you get prima facie at least a consolidated opinion; and that it is not safe to take either horn of the dilemmas that are presented in leaving it to the two Houses to decide separately; either that nothing shall be received that they do not agree to or that everything shall be received that they do not concur in rejecting; that we should provide for what is common in many of the Eastern States, and is the constant and constitutional practice in the State from which I come; that is, on each occasion of a presidential election the appointment of a committee to be named in each House, to be, if you please, equal in number, who should form a single and consolidated committee, the members of which, thus selected and appointed, would presumably be among the purest and best and most skillful in law and in politics of the members of the two Houses; that that body of people should be sworn to take the returns when they are opened by the Vice-President of the United States, and canvass them, canvass them under the sanction of the Constitution and the law; that they should apply to them the same impartial considerations that they would be bound to apply to them had the Constitution declared that those eight persons should form a court who should finally determine every question; and that that body, call it a committee or whatever you like, but one single consolidated body, a joint committee, not acting separately like a conference committee, each representing one House, but one single body of eight or nine men, should take these papers, with the Constitution before them and the law, as to the method of voting and the method of making returns, and report to the two Houses thus assembled what the state of the vote is, and who, according to the Constitution and the laws, has received the majority of the votes. That, as I say, is the constant practice in the State of Vermont.

Mr. MORTON. What would the two Houses do with the report after it gets there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was going on to state: It is one of the misfortunes I labor under that I cannot say everything at once and I do not want to take time. I should propose that when these eight gentlemen, if you please, so acting and so sworn to act impartially, according to the law, should have made their report, that report should be taken as the guide as to who appeared to be the President of the United States, unless the Houses should concur in setting it aside. Instead of saying, as my friend's bill does, that a vote which has not undergone that sworn scrutiny shall be taken, I say that a vote having undergone that scrutiny and being allowed shall be taken, or being rejected shall not be rejected unless the two Houses concur in reversing this sworn examination of men who are in an attitude to make an examination. We all know as a practical thing from what we have seen, those of us who have been here through one or two presidential elections, that the difficulty in coming to a conscientious and right judgment upon a question that is presented is very great on account of the haste, the want of time, the inability of sixty or seventy Senators—taking this small body—being able to see precisely what the question is. Every Senator cannot look at the papers at the same time, and we are in haste; we must act without debate under existing rules; or, if under debate, every Senator who is acting conscientiously, as all do, would wish to see precisely what this document is which is drawn in question. We are acting of course in all these occasions upon the papers and upon the papers alone. Very well. The difficulty, therefore, is one which exists in all large bodies where you are called upon to decide suddenly upon a paper which you have never seen before where a great number of persons cannot take it in hands and inspect it, and they have not time to refer to authority or precedent, or Constitution, in order to come to a right judgment.

Now, if you remit, not by force of the power of either body as a part of the legislative department of the Government but by force of the law, this power to a chosen body of the members of the two Houses, who are small enough to act together, and each one of whom may be able to see precisely what the paper is that is drawn in question and who may by themselves have time enough, if it be not more than an hour, to study and examine the question conscientiously, and under the sanction of an oath to decide rightly, is there not a greater probability that you reach the true and lawful result than there is in saying that you leave it at large to three hundred men at the other end of the Capitol and to seventy-four at this end? I think it is.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose the committee disagree?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will come to that, if my friend will pardon me. I have thought even of that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that the proposition of the Senator from Vermont would change the bill of the Senator from Indiana in this, that after the certificates are opened they are submitted to a committee who are to act instanter and in the presence of the two Houses?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not precisely that. I will come to that presently, and I will condense just as much as possible because I know how valuable time is.

The difference, Mr. President, between what I suggest and what this bill—leaving out double votes for the time being—is this: In the one case, as the bill now stands, everything is to be counted that purports to be a vote unless the two Houses separately concur in rejecting it. My proposition, or suggestion rather, because I have made no motion, is that these papers should be referred to a sworn committee of four Senators and four Representatives; that they should have time to examine them; and acting under their oaths should decide whether the papers presented are votes, and being votes should count them; not being votes they should reject them. Then they report. Now what is to be done, my friend asks. I say that nothing ought to be rejected, after such a report, unless the two Houses agree to reject it; that is to say, that the probability of conformity to the Constitution and conformity to the law is heightened by having the present and sworn judgment of four Senators and four Representatives who have had time and opportunity to scrutinize the documents, is safer than to say that these papers shall be counted, unless the two Houses acting separately in their numerous bodies, say the same thing.

The next question is, What is to happen then? My friend says "Suppose they disagree;" because what I have already said only shows that this paper is not to be counted unless both Houses concur in rejecting it. If it has gone through the scrutiny of eight sworn Senators and Representatives, and they decide upon their oaths that it is not a vote at all, unless both Houses agree in then saying it shall be thrown out, I think that diminishes the chances of fraud, or of passion, or of tumult, a great deal.

My friend from Indiana asks, "What are you to do if they are equally divided in opinion, if you have eight?" Then, Mr. President, in order to meet his views, although it would not quite meet my own, I should propose that after a scrutiny by four Senators and four Representatives, made a committee for that purpose, if the question were so doubtful that they were equally divided in opinion, I would take his theory as it now stands in the bill and let it go, that a paper which came so near, to say the least of it, being what it purported to be, the vote of a State, should not be rejected unless, as he now proposes without that scrutiny, both Houses should agree in rejecting it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont may have spoken on the word "then" in the Constitution, but owing to the interruptions around me I may not have heard it; but if he has not, I wish to ask him what construction can be given to the word "then" in this sentence:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

How restricted does the Senator take the word "then" to be?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I am safe in saying I have no doubt I give the same meaning to that word that my friend from Ohio does; that it must mean "on that occasion." "Then" does not mean "at that instant of time," because you cannot count a vote in an instant. The instant is gone while you are uttering the word "count." But the word "then," I think, in suits between private individuals, which my friend so well knows about, means "on that occasion."

Mr. CONKLING. "Forthwith."

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Forthwith," as my friend from New York suggests. That is to say, "then and there," "on that occasion," "forthwith," "without the intervention of any other affair;" and therefore if it took two days, as it may in a hundred years when we have a hundred States, to count these votes, it is "then" all the time. So that in the suggestion I make I would provide that this committee thus sworn to scrutinize and report upon these votes, doing it "then," would fulfill the Constitution if it took them a week to consider it, the two Houses remaining in joint session, by recess or otherwise, awaiting their report, just as if we were to direct the Committee on Privileges and Elections at this moment, by a resolution, to bring in a bill forthwith to preserve the peace in the District of Columbia, if there were a great tumult here, and that we would do no other business until that were done. What would we do? That committee would retire and we would take a recess for two hours. The two hours come; the committee is not ready to report; we take a recess for two hours more, or two days, any time, within the Constitution, is it not "then?" I think "then" means "on that occasion," that is to say, it is the business presently to be performed and the next thing to be done, and therefore covers a space of time broad enough to accomplish the purpose for which the Constitution requires the two Houses to attend. If I am wrong in that, I hope my friend from Ohio will suggest some more limited and better definition of the word "then."

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator is correct in his interpretation of

"then," would not his own line of procedure be excluded by it? If "then" commands the convention to count the vote the next thing, would it not prohibit the convention from referring a vote to a mixed commission such as he suggests?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it would not, any more than it would prohibit the convention from opening the package which had been unsealed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. That is preliminary. That has been done before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; all the President of the Senate shall do is to open the package, "and the votes shall then be counted." That requires that the eye of somebody shall run over the certificate to perceive that it is the certificate of the State, that it bears its great seal, that it bears the signature of the governor, that it contains the statements which the law requires that the electors met on the day prescribed by law and cast their votes in conformity to law. If you are to hold otherwise, then you hold that this Government is not a government of law but a government of something else. I do not think that there is any difficulty about the word "then." I think it refers to the occasion and that it means precisely the same as if the Constitution had said "on that occasion and as the business in hand, at that time, there shall be the necessary steps taken under the law to carry out this Constitution, such as the law may provide to ascertain what are the votes of States and how, they being justly compiled, the result is to be ascertained." That is what I think it means. So I do not think that a committee, which should be sworn to take these papers as the agents of the law and the Constitution, and to make a sworn report upon them, on the occasion of this great and august performance, would be a violation of the Constitution, but much the more carrying out its true and perfect spirit and intent.

When the proper time comes I shall offer an amendment (I do not know that it will get any votes, but the gravity of the occasion compels me to do what I think will be my duty) which will cover the views I have expressed.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there is great force in what the Senator from Vermont says; and the question I put to him, as to the signification he gave the word "then," was to draw from him an expression of his opinion upon the subject, and not to intimate any opinion of my own. I might admit that the word "then" means "upon that occasion," as he suggests, or that it means "immediately thereafter;" that is to say, immediately after the opening of the votes, without the intervention of any other business; that they should go on until the counting takes place. Of course what time is necessary for the counting and what agencies may be necessary in order to ascertain all that is necessary to a counting of the votes may be resorted to. I do not gainsay that, always consistent, however, with the fact that the votes are to be counted forthwith after they are opened, and in the presence of the two Houses, and the result declared. Now, whether under this provision of the Constitution the word "then" can be extended so as to cover the time which would elapse in a canvass of these votes by a committee, such as has been suggested, is a very grave question, upon which I would want to reflect before forming an opinion. I shall say no more of that, therefore, at present.

But there was one branch of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont upon which I wish to say a word, because, with great respect to his opinions, I am unable to concur with him, and that is in regard to the idea expressed by him that the election of a President of the United States may be made the subject of contest in the courts of the United States. To that view I entirely dissent. Let us see first what the judicial power is. I beg the attention of my friend from Vermont to what I am about to say. I read from the third article of the Constitution, section 1:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices, &c.

That simply states where the judicial power shall be vested, without any definition of the extent of that power. That is provided in the second section:

> SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

I read from the original Constitution. Now, as is well known, it has been decided again and again, in accordance with this language of the Constitution, that there must be a case made before the judicial power can be exercised. It must be a case, what is known in the technical language of the law, either common law or equity or statute law, as a case, before the court can get any jurisdiction of the subject, for the Constitution is plain that "the judicial powers shall extend to all cases in law and equity." Hence you must have a case before the judicial power can be brought into action. That has been frequently decided by the Supreme Court.

Then, coming to the grant of original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, we find it provided for in the next paragraph of the section from which I have just read—

> In all cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction.

Very plainly these words do not include the case of a contest for an office; and the Supreme Court has decided definitely that you cannot add by legislation to this original jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution, so that you could not by law provide that there might be a contest by quo warranto, or any other form, originally begun in the Supreme Court of the United States, because no such thing is embraced by the words "cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party," and they are the only cases in which the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction:

> In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

It follows from this that if an election of President or the right of an individual to the office of President can be contested in a judicial court of the United States, that contest must be begun in one of the courts inferior to the Supreme Court, and can only reach that court by Congress conferring upon it appellate jurisdiction from the decision of the inferior court. And furthermore, it follows, as the inferior courts have no jurisdiction whatsoever except such as Congress may confer upon them by law, that whether they should have jurisdiction in such a case or not would depend wholly upon the will of Congress, and therefore it would be just as one Congress might decide or another Congress might decide whether there should be this judicial contest at all. Was it intended that the title to the office of President of the United States should depend upon a contest in a court, which contest itself is wholly dependent upon the fluctuating opinions of Congress? One Congress might pass a law clothing the Supreme Court of the United States with power to entertain a quo warranto in such a contest, and just when that contest was at its height, and before any decision had been rendered upon it, the next Congress might repeal the law conferring the jurisdiction. Was any such thing as that ever intended by the framers of the Constitution? It seems to me not. It would be a very extraordinary constitution that would thus leave it to the fluctuating will of Congress whether or not in the first place there should be any judicial cognizance of the question at all, and in the next place that would allow Congress one day to provide for this judicial cognizance and the next day or the next week repeal the law that gave the court jurisdiction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly. I wish to arrive at the truth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would not that same argument apply to all the cases of judicial jurisdiction arising under the Constitution and provided for in terms except those "affecting embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and to those in which a State shall be a party;" and then would not the argument be just as great that Congress could not have intended that there should not be any trial of issues between citizens or anybody else in cases arising under the Constitution, except those over which the Supreme Court had original jurisdiction? In addition to that Congress must create a Supreme Court, to begin with, and how could it be supposed the Constitution intended to allow such suits, inasmuch as it was left for Congress to create the court to do it?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator's question seems plausible, but it is not satisfactory at all. What I say is that, from the very nature of the thing, it never could have been intended that the title to the office of Chief Magistrate of this nation should be subject to any such fluctuation as that. The idea of the framers of the Constitution was that that question should be settled, settled at once and settled forever, and that it was better for the peace of the country that it should even be settled erroneously than that it should remain unsettled. It never was intended that the President should be in the exercise de facto, in virtue of the count made before the two Houses, of the office of President of the United States, and at the same time that his right to that office should be a subject of contest in the courts. And how strangely would it work.

Suppose a contest of the office of President; suppose the case that has been supposed by the Senator from Vermont, that one man is declared, in strict pursuance of the Constitution, to be President of the United States; of course then he is inaugurated; and then a contest is begun by quo warranto in a circuit court of the United States. I say nothing now about how long it would take to decide that controversy, because if a quo warranto could be brought in one case and for one reason, it could be brought for any reason that would vitiate an election. I will suppose a quo warranto to be begun in the circuit court; that circuit court renders a decree ousting the President of his office; an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court affirms the decision. How are you going to enforce it? It is made the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. How are you going to enforce that? The Supreme Court has no power to do it; it commands no army; it has no treasury. How can you enforce a judgment of ouster against the man who is de facto President of the United States and has the Army at his back? Was it ever intended by our fathers that any such state of case as that should arise? It seems to me certainly not.

But there is still another reason why the idea is wholly inadmissible. When would such a judicial contest end? If, as I said before, a judicial contest may be commenced for one cause, it may be for another. Suppose that the ground of the contest should be that there was fraud in the election in the great State of New York, that there were fraudulent votes given, that men voted who were not qualified to vote, that men voted under duress, that men were bribed to vote, and the like, and that if such votes were cast out then the vote of that State, which determined the election, would have been given for the unsuccessful candidate. Suppose that is the ground of contest, then the President being defendant in such a proceeding would have the right to recriminate and say "there may have been votes given for me by persons who were not entitled; there may have been bribery or corruption or intimidation or duress on my side; but I answer, et tu quoque; there was as much or more on your side;" and then the court is to go into a canvass of the election in the State of New York, and find out which set of electors received a majority of the lawful votes of that State. I do not remember at this instant how many votes New York casts; I think it is about 700,000. Will the Senator from New York please tell me?

Mr. CONKLING. Eight hundred thousand.

Mr. THURMAN. Eight hundred thousand. When will you get done canvassing 800,000 votes or the half of 800,000 votes or the fourth of 800,000 votes, and who is to pay the expense? Such a contest on such a ground as that, the most material of all grounds, would be simply impossible.

Again, suppose the question is whether or not voters were intimidated, thousands of them at a time, which we hear so much of in regard to Southern States, where in the world would be the end of the testimony? When would you get it all taken?

But here comes still another reason. This matter is to be submitted to the judge, in the first place, of the circuit court. That judge may be or may not be a judge appointed by the very man whose title to the seat is contested; probably he would not be, and yet he might be because you would have to fix some place where the suit should be brought, and at any rate while that suit is pending every vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court, which is ultimately to decide the case, would be filled by the very man whose title to the office of President was contested.

It seems to me that these considerations abundantly show that the idea of contesting the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States in any court whatsoever is not to be entertained for a moment. I do not, therefore, agree with the Senator from Vermont that there can be any such contest. I do not think that the framers of the Constitution intended that the title of the persons declared in the joint assembly of the two Houses to be President should remain in doubt for a single moment, but that, on the contrary, from the time he was declared to be elected all men should respect his title, for he was declared elected pursuant to the Constitution of the country. There might be error in deciding who was elected; every body of men is liable to commit error; courts are liable to commit error as well as congresses; the decision may be in favor of the wrong man; but the public safety and peace require that that decision, when once made, shall be final and irrevocable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is one idea which the Senator from Ohio has entirely omitted, which is conclusive upon this subject; it certainly is to my mind. I think the twelfth article of the amendment to the Constitution settles who has jurisdiction over this question. It does not do so in express terms, but it does do so by necessary implication. It says that the President of the Senate is to open the certificates and the votes, which are then to be counted in the presence of the two Houses. That by necessary implication to my mind gives the jurisdiction over this subject to the two Houses; and if the Constitution does give it to them, we cannot by law give it to the judiciary of the country.

Mr. MORTON. I would suggest to my friend further that the twelfth article of the amendments provides that if no candidate receive a majority of all the electors appointed, the House of Representatives shall immediately proceed to elect by States, giving no interval of time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly. The whole frame-work of the Constitution is repugnant to the idea of its being settled by the judiciary. But while I have not made up my mind it does not seem to me that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont is at all subject to a like criticism. That proposition is to have a committee appointed who shall instanter, if the thing is feasible—I do not know that it is—consider the votes, and if they report favorably on a vote it shall be accepted unless both Houses reject it, and if they report unfavorably it shall only be accepted on both Houses voting for it; the only effect of that committee being not to take the jurisdiction away from Congress but to change the rule of evidence, it strikes me that it may be a precautionary measure of some value. I do not know whether the Senator from Indiana has thought of that.

Mr. MORTON. The committee had the benefit of having the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont before it, and it was somewhat considered. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont is to intrude a joint committee of the two Houses into the consideration and determination of this question, providing that that committee shall be four of each House, a joint committee of eight, that it shall not be like a conference committee, the members from each branch acting separately, but that it shall compose one committee and that the returns of the election of electors shall be referred to that committee, and when that committee makes its report that shall stand as the voice of both Houses unless overruled by both. I think there are a number of very grave objections to that.

In the first place it is a plan that is unknown to the system of legislation which we have, a joint committee of the two Houses having power of that kind conferred upon it. It certainly was not embraced in the idea that the two Houses should be present, although not as a joint convention but present each in its own capacity when those votes are counted. In the next place it involves the dangers of the present rule to a very great extent, and it involves another danger perhaps equal to that in its character. It places the election of President and Vice-President in the hands of eight men, or rather a majority of eight men, which would be five, unless their action is overruled by the two Houses. You substitute the judgment of eight men or a majority of eight men for the judgment of the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; we substitute that for the naked return which the Senator's bill proposes shall stand unless the two Houses reject it. I say subject the naked return to these eight men unless the two Houses reject their conclusion, which gives you a higher security.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir. I think it does not give a higher security, and I think it presents the greatest temptation for corruption that could possibly be devised. You place the election of Chief Magistrate in the hands of five men out of eight, and their action is to stand unless overruled by the joint convention of the two Houses, and the two Houses differing in politics may not agree jointly to overrule that action if it shall be in favor of that candidate who has a majority in one of the Houses. You have the very difficulty involved in the present rule. Let me suppose a case. You appoint four Senators and four Representatives to constitute one committee. The House is democratic and the Senate is republican. They get together and the four members of the House and one member of the Senate agree to make a certain report throwing out the votes of certain States, if you please, or counting improperly the votes of certain States, and then the conclusion of those five of the eight must stand unless both Houses agree to overrule that conclusion. That is putting a majority of the joint committee of the two Houses in a position that the Constitution has never contemplated. No precedent for a thing of that kind, I venture to say, can be found, and a more dangerous contrivance cannot well be devised. It brings the question back to just where it stands now. The question would then be to get possession of the committee. If both Houses are of the same complexion, and both candidates for President are substantially of the same complexion, the question is determined by a majority of that committee. If the Houses are of different political complexion, the committee will be divided in precisely the same way; they will either not agree at all, or if they do agree it must be in favor of one party or the other, and that party is sure to have a House against it.

It seems to me that there is nothing to be gained by this provision. It complicates the matter. It substitutes the judgment of four or five men for the judgment of the two Houses. The other plan is simpler, and it is safe, in my judgment. A return is made. The Senator from Vermont says it may be a forgery out and out. If so, that is not the return from the State; that is not what is contemplated; but here is a return from a State. It is opened in the presence of the two Houses. It bears the seal of the State; it has all the insignia of coming from the State of Vermont, if you please. As it stands, without the twenty-second joint rule, the President of the Senate opens that vote, and it must be counted. There is no help for it. There is no provision by which you can avoid counting that vote. Under the twenty-second joint rule if an objection is taken to the counting of the vote the two Houses separate, and if one House refuses to overrule the objection the vote is thrown out; Vermont is disfranchised just as Arkansas was disfranchised upon a mere technicality that turned out not to be founded in fact, disfranchised upon a trifle that turned out to have nothing in it; and that was only two years ago.

Mr. President, where the vote of a State comes up—and a mere forgery cannot be intruded; and a mere mock electoral college cannot be palmed off; it will be understood that this vote has come from the messenger sent by the State or has come in the regular way—that vote ought to be counted; the State should not be disfranchised unless both Houses agree to do so, and have a good reason for doing it. You cannot pass a simple law, without the concurrence of both Houses, even of the most unimportant character. I ask if you will disfranchise a State or half a dozen States without the concurrence of both Houses, and what is the advantage of intruding this committee here? You create a small body of men and you clothe them virtually with the power of determining who shall be President of the United States, a majority if you please of eight men, subject to the greatest temptation that ever a majority of eight men was subject to in this world—the power to determine who shall be President and Vice-President of the United States. If men are weak, if they can be corrupted, if temptation may overcome them, you place these men in a position where they are more exposed than they could be in any other way. It is a contrivance unknown, utterly wanting in analogy in anything common to our system of government.

This bill provides that if an objection is made to an electoral vote, the two Houses shall separate and consider the question. If it is a forgery out and out, there is no doubt but that it would be objected to. We must consider that both Houses act with some integrity, although they may be swayed by popular passion or by popular feeling to a great extent. If both Houses concur in rejecting the vote, the State is disfranchised. If they do not, then the vote is to be counted. But there is one case that is provided for in this bill, a case where, for example, there are two rival governments in a State or where there are two sets of electors, both certified to in the same form, where there may be an actual controversy, as there has been in some of the States, and two sets of returns are sent here. How will you settle that question? This bill provides that when that question comes up it shall be referred to the two Houses, and that return which shall be the genuine return according to the votes of both Houses shall be counted. You cannot adopt any other rule than that in my opinion, and for that reason I think the amendment proposed is without merit.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask a question on the point he is now discussing?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that where there is more than one return, as is provided in the second section of this bill, and the two Houses are unable to decide which is the true return, then the implication is that the vote of the State is not to be counted. That, I understand the Senator to say, is left to implication entirely. The section does not state what shall be the effect if the two Houses are unable to agree. It says that the return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true return. But suppose that they are unable to agree upon either, then what is to be the result? I understand, by implication of course, the vote is to be rejected; but I submit to the Senator whether that ought not to be put in such language as that it should not be left to implication.

Mr. MORTON. I would have no objection to an amendment making that certain, but I think that is the implication.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no doubt that is the implication. I suggest—without using too many words—that the Senator use this language: "and that return from such State shall only be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall each decide;" putting in the word "only" after "shall" and "each" before "decide."

Mr. CONKLING. Why not put it after "return;" so as to read: "and that return only," &c.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest it, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair.) The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill in line 7, section 2, after the word "return," by inserting the word "only," and after the word "shall" inserting "each;" so as to read: "And that return only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall each decide to be the true and valid return."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. At the suggestion of several Senators around me, for the purpose of taking the sense of the Senate, I move that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven for the purpose of finishing the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us finish the bill now.

Mr. MORTON. I will take the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to take a recess from five to half past seven o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. I made the motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] more particularly. I would much prefer to go on now and finish the bill. I think it can last but a little while longer, but I am willing to take the sense of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. My experience has always been that it is better at a reasonable time to take a recess and come back at half past seven, and then we can sit for a number of hours.

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. THURMAN. I would prefer to sit this bill out if we can come to an understanding that we shall adjourn when we are through with this bill, which I agree with the Senator from Indiana will be shortly, as far as I know, for I do not know of anybody who wishes to speak at length. But if it is meant immediately after this bill shall be disposed of to take up another measure and proceed with its consideration to-night, then I think the sooner we take a recess the better. And therefore it all depends with me upon the question whether or not another measure is to be taken up and proceeded with to-night after the disposition of this bill. If that is the purpose of the majority of the Senate, then I hope the Senator from Indiana will renew the motion for a recess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After this bill is disposed of I propose to move to take up the civil-rights bill. I shall then propose, speaking as I hope with the assent of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, that the gentlemen opposed to the bill may have all the time until to-morrow afternoon at five o'clock to discuss the bill; that then the general debate shall terminate, and if any amendments are to be offered to the bill that they may be offered and there may be the short debate of five or ten minutes in support of amendments or against them that in such cases is usually allowed, and that then the Senator in charge of the bill, myself or any other Senator who may happen to have charge at the time, shall have half an hour to close the debate, and we then vote. If that is agreeable to gentlemen on the other side, all I would wish to do to-night would be to dispose of this bill and take up the other and then adjourn, if gentlemen on the other side would like to do so.

Mr. THURMAN. I should not like to make any agreement of that kind, at least to-day. It is too soon to make an agreement as to when debate shall be closed on that bill. I, however, feel some little delicacy about making any suggestion upon it. I do not expect to speak on the civil-rights bill. I have twice spoken upon it, and spoken very elaborately at different sessions of the Senate, and I do not feel disposed to take up any time by further remarks but would rather leave it to others who have not enjoyed the opportunity of giving their opinions. But I think it is too soon for us to come to any conclusions. Besides, I hope that when we are through with this bill, a majority of the Senate will proceed to consider a bill that it seems to me demands the attention of the Senate now, that must be taken up now or be lost; I mean what is commonly called the steamboat bill. If it has been determined elsewhere that the civil-rights bill shall have precedence over everything else when this bill is disposed of, I know very well that any effort on my part to get up the steamboat bill will be futile; but in the hope that it has not been decided elsewhere that the civil-rights bill overrides everything else, I shall feel it my duty to ask the Senate after this present bill has been concluded to take up the steamboat bill. At this early stage, in fact before the civil-rights bill has been taken up at all, I do not think it will be possible for us to come to any arrangement as to when debate on it shall close.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is nothing for us, then, but to go on and do the business that is before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, two or three considerations have been thrown out in this debate as the real ground why this bill ought to be passed at the present session. We are told that unless it shall pass or some bill like it shall pass at this session, the country will be in great danger of revolution when the time shall come to count the electoral votes for President at the next election. We are told that the danger is imminent. I have been struck with the fact, however, that we are simply so told. No fact, no circumstance has been brought to the attention of the country which goes to show that there is more danger at this time or that there will be more danger two years hence than there has been in the past. From the beginning of the Government down to February, 1865, there was no rule or statute prescribing how the electoral votes for President and Vice-President should be counted. During all those years, in times of high party excitement, when party distinctions were as marked as they are now, no danger of this sort ever came on the country, nor was it seriously apprehended at any time that there would be a revolution. In 1865 the twenty-second joint rule was adopted. What particular considerations moved Congress to adopt that rule I do not know. The political party then in power and administering the Government was the same that administers the Government to-day. That rule adopted by that party having such majority provided that—

> No question shall be decided affirmatively and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses.

Then no vote was to be counted except by the concurrent action of the two Houses. Now suddenly it is proposed to abolish this rule, to pass a statute that is to govern the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and to reverse this rule, whereby it is to be provided that no vote shall be rejected for President and Vice-President unless it shall be done by the concurrent vote of both Houses. I cannot understand, I have not been told anything that gives me to understand, why there is a necessity, or what that necessity is if there is any, for this sudden change.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator ought to remember that this is not a sudden change. This topic has been under discussion almost every year since I have had the honor to be here, and it is a misfortune that it has been delayed so long in reaching some satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. MERRIMON. But we are told now that it is suddenly very important to pass it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not suddenly.

Mr. MERRIMON. No graver question could come before the Senate. It involves constitutional considerations of the most serious and complicated character. Right at the heel of the session, when there is no time for consideration or proper deliberation, we are called upon to pass this very delicate bill and touching a very delicate power to be exercised by Congress. I think that no good reason has been assigned for this precipitancy, and I can conceive of none except this, that the Government is about to change hands politically. In the next Congress there will be a very large majority of democrats in the lower branch of Congress; there will be a republican majority in the Senate, and I will not say it is so, but it looks very much as if the purpose was to create a check, a negative upon the democratic House. If such consideration is a moving consideration to pass this bill in this precipitate manner, I maintain that it is insulting to the democratic party, to the country, and to the American people. They are as patriotic as the republican party. They are no more given to revolution and to doing that which is unjust than any other party in the country. No consideration has been brought forward, I maintain none can be brought forward, which goes to show that the democratic party will be less dutiful to the American people, less dutiful to their obligations to the Constitution, when the time shall come to count the electoral vote for President and Vice-President again, than they have been in the past or than any party has been in the past. I believe that the Fourty-fourth Congress will be as honest a Congress as this, and that in the exercise of the duties that will devolve on the Congress at that time in counting the electoral votes, a patriotic spirit will move the Congress as it has done in the past and there will be no greater danger of revolution then than there has been in the past. At all events no reason has been assigned, no fact has been stated, no consideration has been brought to the attention of the Senate going to show that there will be a different state of feeling at that time from what has prevailed in the past. There is then no necessity for the precipitancy that is manifested in considering this bill and in passing it right at the close of the session, when other matters are pressing upon us, when appropriation bills ought to be under consideration to the end that the interests of the Government may be carried on in the ordinary lawful way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are no appropriation bills before us.

Mr. MERRIMON. If there are none there ought to be some, and there would be if it were not for the bringing forward of political measures.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator asked for a suggestion as to the reason of this. Will he allow me to show him one?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. He says this measure grows out of the fact that the next House is democratic. He will find by reading the rule under which we now vote for President—

> And no question shall be decided affirmatively and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses.

Now, if he is putting it on the ground that we desire political advantage, the old rule is the one we would act under, because, having a majority in the Senate, we could prevent the vote of any State being counted by just saying it shall not be counted. We cannot do that under this law unless by the consent of your democratic House. If we acted on political grounds, we would want the rule as it stands, not this bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. It might operate either way. It might operate to reject the vote.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I beg your pardon. If you talk about dishonesty, I do not attribute any dishonesty to any House, or any political trick.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no political trickery in a bill that is discussed and understood; but if we desired political advantage, we have it in the present rule; and it is to prevent that that the bill is presented to the Senate requiring that both Houses must concur to reject a vote. That is the very object. The bill is taking an advantage away from ourselves that we now have under the rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. So far as that goes, it is about as much one way as the other.

Mr. LOGAN. Not by any means; because the vote is bound to be counted, unless both Houses concur in rejecting it. Hence the other House may get a count of the vote without the assent of ours. Both Houses have to concur under this bill to exclude a vote; otherwise, under the rule, one House could exclude a vote.

Mr. MERRIMON. In order to answer the Senator from Illinois intelligibly, I will read the provision in the bill touching this matter. The bill provides:

> And no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

Now, suppose that in the next counting of electoral votes such electoral votes shall come up to be counted as came up from the State of Louisiana two years ago. Although, as I contend, that electoral vote was unlawful and ought not to be counted at all, yet that vote must be counted unless both branches of Congress shall concur in rejecting it. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly you are correct that a vote cannot be rejected under this bill except by the concurrence of both Houses. You are going on the presumption that one House or the other is going to be dishonest and will object to a vote anyhow. We go upon the presumption that men will act honestly; and inasmuch as both Houses have to count the vote and assemble together to count the vote, therefore both Houses ought to determine when a vote is not correct. Is not that the rule in legislation? What do you convene both Houses for?

Mr. MERRIMON. If that is correct, why was not that the rule before?

Mr. LOGAN. We want to correct a rule that I consider incorrect.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why not alter the rule? Why adopt this elaborate statute?

Mr. LOGAN. This does alter the rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is true this alters the rule, but it is done by statute and not by a change of the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no difference between a statute and a rule, so far as the effect goes.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is a very wide difference between a statute and a rule.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all, so far as Congress is concerned.

Mr. MERRIMON. The same reasons which existed at the time the rule was adopted exist to-day; and the point I was making when the Senator from Illinois interrupted me was that no sufficient reason has been brought forward in this debate to justify the precipitancy with which this measure is being pressed through Congress. The Government has lasted nearly a century without it; and every one must concede, all have conceded indeed, that the difficulty to be solved is one of great importance that requires the highest and gravest deliberation. It is a statute that ought to be passed into law with great care, and it ought not to be passed until the whole matter is thoroughly ventilated in both branches of Congress, and every one must concede that there is no opportunity to do that now. We are to pass this bill through the Senate after a debate of three or four hours, when it ought to engage the attention of the Senate, it seems to me, as many days.

Mr. LOGAN. It has engaged the Senate for years, and the House too.

Mr. MERRIMON. Not this Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. A proposition of this kind has been before committees for years. It has been before the committee on which I am serving, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, ever since I have been in the Senate—some proposition or other of this kind.

Mr. MERRIMON. But, Mr. President, to pass over that, in my judgment Congress has power to pass an act regulating the manner of comparing the electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and that power is derived from two clauses in the Constitution. The first is this——

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to disturb the Senator, but there is one point I should like to suggest to him. He says there has been no reason given for what he calls this precipitate action on the part of the Senate. He says we got on for many years without any rule of this kind. That is true. I ask him if he believes had Mr. Greeley been living at the time of the counting of the last vote, and had the votes of Louisiana, of Arkansas, and of Georgia been sufficient to turn the election on either side under this rule—does he believe we could have got through without a revolution?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; I do. I think the republican party would have decided that General Grant was elected, and I have too much confidence in the patriotism of the democratic party and the democratic people of this country to believe of them that they would revolutionize the country and destroy the whole system of government because that decision had been made by a power authorized to do it.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will ask the Senator suppose it had been decided on the other side, what does he think the result would have been?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think the republican people of the Union would have submitted to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Whether they thought it was correct or not?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. You say the democrats would have submitted. Suppose these States had voted for Mr. Greeley fairly, and there was no reason why it could be said that the result of their vote was unfair, and those States gave Mr. Greeley the majority, but by throwing all these States out we elected General Grant by one vote; do you believe then if the republican party had thrown out those States and elected Grant by one vote, while if they had been fairly counted Mr. Greeley would have been elected, the democratic party would in that case have submitted?

Mr. MERRIMON. In the first place I do not think the republican party would do that; but having the power to do that, being charged by the Constitution of the country with the power to do it, if they had made the decision, I think the American people would have submitted to it.

Mr. LOGAN. You do?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Our past experience does not prove that to me.

Mr. MERRIMON. And further than that, I believe it is characteristic of the American people that they submit to a decision properly made by the proper authority however much they may condemn its justice, however erroneous it may be, just as they submit to a decision made by a court having competent jurisdiction of a question to decide it. If the Supreme Court having jurisdiction of a question here before it were to make a decision that was distasteful to four-fifths or nine-tenths of the American people, I believe they would submit to that decision because the proper constitutional tribunal had made the decision; and just so I believe that if the republican party in 1873 had improperly and erroneously decided that General Grant was elected in comparing the electoral vote, however much they might have condemned it, however erroneous, false, fraudulent it might have been, Congress having the power to decide that question and having decided it, the American people would have submitted to it; but they would have condemned the act at the ballot-box. When the next election took place the administration would not have received the cordial support of the American people; it would have been condemned, the whole party would have gone down in history, condemned, with the seal of condemnation upon it; but the people would have submitted to it. If I am not correct in this view, if that revolutionary spirit prevails in the American people, that mobocratic spirit which is attributed to them, free government cannot last. If the people are not honest, if they are not willing to submit to their tribunals, if they are not willing to submit to the Constitution and live under it, then we have no government; might is right, and despotism is triumphant in this country. I do not believe any such doctrine, and when gentlemen make such suggestions with a view to push this bill through Congress in such a hurry they fail to alarm my fears. I believe I have confidence enough in the republican party of the nation to believe that if, when the next electoral vote is counted, the Congress shall ascertain that a democratic President shall have been elected, the republicans of this country will submit to it. If they do not do it they are not fit to be Americans, and they are less Americans than I believe they are.

But, sir, to go on with the point I was on when the Senator interrupted me, I say I believe Congress has power to pass a law regulating the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and that power is conferred by two provisions contained in the Constitution. The first is in these words:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President, &c.

That is as far as it is material to read for my purpose. Now I maintain that if there were no other words in the Constitution conferring power upon Congress, these are sufficient. When the Constitution provides that the certificates of election shall be sent to the President of the Senate, through him Congress gets jurisdiction of the electoral vote and in the particular way prescribed in the Constitution. What is that? That the Senate and House of Representatives shall come together in joint assemblage; there the President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, ex vi termini; the vote must be counted. The vote must be counted by the Congress; the vote must be counted by the Congress in joint assemblage; it must be the act of this joint assemblage; and I maintain that, touching the counting of the vote, every question that shall arise must be decided by the Congress, not as two separate bodies, but as the Congress sitting in joint assembly.

Mr. MORTON. If I understand the Senator's position, it is this: that when the vote is counted the two Houses come together and act as one body, and that each Senator and each Representative shall have one vote.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; that is it exactly.

Mr. MORTON. And that they must settle all questions?

Mr. MERRIMON. They must settle all questions. It is done after the manner in which United States Senators are elected by the several State Legislatures. The act of Congress prescribes how the Senators shall be elected. The two houses of the Legislature vote on the first day separately. On the second day the two houses go into joint assemblage, and as a whole, as a joint body, they ballot for a United States Senator, and continue to ballot until one shall be elected. They vote as one body; the two branches of the Legislature are in joint assemblage; and the assemblage cast their votes as one body for United States Senator.

I maintain that by all rules of constitutional construction, of legal construction, the two Houses met for the purpose of comparing the electoral votes for President and Vice-President act as one body. They act in their joint capacity, and all questions that may arise touching the counting of the votes must be decided by that joint body. Why, sir, let me ask this: When a question is raised, as it may be raised under the twenty-second joint rule and it may be raised under this bill if it shall become a law, where is the constitutional authority for the two bodies separating, the Senate going into its Chamber here and deciding a question here in this body? I respectfully ask Senators who are supporting this bill to show me any constitutional authority for that. Show me any rule of constitutional construction or of legal construction which warrants the joint body in separating and going to their respective Chambers and deciding a question. Why, sir, in that case the matter is decided by the Senate as a Senate in its own Chamber, separate and apart from the other branch of Congress. The House decides it as a body separate and apart from the Senate. It cannot be pretended that there is one word in the Constitution which authorizes the two bodies thus to separate and to make a decision touching that matter. It was contemplated by the Constitution that the two bodies should go into joint session and for a particular purpose, to exercise a power that was conferred upon them as a joint body and to decide all questions touching the matter they had jurisdiction of as a joint body, as such joint body.

I say again that I respectfully ask any Senator who can do so to point me to a single word in the Constitution that authorizes the Senate when a question shall be raised under the twenty-second joint rule or under this bill if it shall become a law, to come back into the Senate Chamber, and here, in its capacity as a Senate, separate and apart from the House of Representatives, decide a question and then go back into joint session again. They are not exercising a power conferred by the Constitution when they do that, and I maintain therefore that Congress has power to pass a law which shall regulate the action and the proceedings had by that joint assemblage in comparing the electoral vote for President and Vice-President. This bill, if it shall pass, in so far as it provides that when a question is raised there touching the counting of the vote, the Senate shall come back into its Chamber and decide that question, in my judgment is absolutely null and void; it is inoperative, for no such power is conferred by the Constitution.

There is another clause that authorizes Congress to pass this act which I beg to read. I refer to the clause authorizing Congress—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

That clause of the Constitution is in aid of the clause which I have been endeavoring to elucidate. It authorizes Congress to pass all laws necessary to execute every provision contained in the twelfth article of amendments, but it authorizes Congress to pass all laws necessary to execute the twelfth article consistently with the power conferred upon Congress in the twelfth article. By the twelfth article the electoral vote for President and Vice-President must be counted by what body? By the Senate? No. By the House? No. But it must be counted by the Senate and the House sitting in the chamber of the House of Representatives as a joint body. Then if they must count the vote as a joint body, how can it be pretended that the two branches of Congress shall separate to decide questions essential to that count? I maintain that it is not only illogical but manifestly in the face of the Constitution.

But, sir, I want to say to the Senate that for one I have not studied this subject as thoroughly as I should desire to do. It is a grave question, one of great moment, one that ought to be decided after due deliberation and long discussion. In my judgment, it ought to be postponed until the next Congress, and then I should be very glad if the Senator from Indiana would bring the question forward early in the session so that we might have ample time to examine it and debate it thoroughly and pass a law without reference to party considerations one way or the other, and a law that would become as perpetual as the Constitution itself and ward off any possible danger.

But, sir, I repeat what I said a moment ago, that I do not believe there is danger of revolution; I do not believe that revolution is imminent. I have too much confidence in the American people of all parties to believe that they are going to destroy their Government because Congress in the exercise of a power confided to it shall decide that one man or another has been elected President.

My main object in rising was to call attention to the point I have made that Congress must sit as a joint body in counting the electoral vote and that their decisions made touching the counting of that electoral vote must be made as a joint body and in no other way.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, this proposition gives trouble in coming to a correct or even a satisfactory conclusion. My trouble is not in regard so much to this bill, or to the present joint rule, or to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont; but it goes up higher than that; it goes to the question of our constitutional power to pass any measure at all upon the subject. We all know, and I fully appreciate the fact, that there is danger, great danger, lurking in the existing joint rule, and no one can doubt but that there is equal danger in the proposition now under consideration; and therefore my earnest desire was that we might have a constitutional amendment in order to obviate the difficulties that we necessarily incur in attempting to legislate upon the subject at all. As soon as we begin to legislate we get into trouble; and the difficulty is that the moment we undertake to give a direction to the Constitution apart from its word and spirit and then enact laws or rules to suit, we hardly know where to begin and where to end. If we once begin to legislate on this subject, we hardly know where to stop. I care not what exigency brought into being the twenty-second joint rule; it is a most extraordinary rule for any exigency, and the bill now before us is not less extraordinary in its general import. It proposes to supply alleged defects or omissions in the Constitution, when it cannot cover the whole question nor apply the general and effective remedy.

The honorable Senator from Vermont has offered an amendment that in some respects is really more reasonable and probably would tend to secure better results than either the twenty-second joint rule or the bill now before the Senate; and yet when we come to look at that proposition, it is equally objectionable as a mode of safety from tumult or trouble, when we observe that the Constitution is so emphatic in respect to the power of both Houses when in joint convention, in respect to the power of both Houses when they meet in joint convention, as they are directed to do, and when in their presence the certificates shall be opened and then counted.

The only provision of the Constitution justifying any legislation upon this subject is this:

> The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

This is the only ground for legislation of any kind. It is very narrow indeed.

I listened to the honorable Senator from Vermont with a great deal of interest. He undertook to expand the word "then" to a very great extent, and so as to cover very considerable legislation. I very readily recognized that he could technically, according to his reasoning, expand or extend that word to cover almost an infinity of time, a whole session of Congress for illustration. But even extending it as far as he would, to what results do we come under his proposition? What can we inquire into during all that extended time? The Constitution is emphatic that the votes shall be counted in the presence of both Chambers. What does the amendment of the Senator from Vermont propose to do? To appoint a joint committee, and they are to inquire into something and then report? What is to be the reach of their power? Are they to inquire simply as to what arises on the face of the certificate only? How far is the inquiry to extend, whether it be made by a joint committee, or by the tellers, or by the two Houses separated? Is it merely and purely to look at the certificates to see whether they are properly executed and have been duly attested? Is that the limit of the power, I ask, or can other questions, as to the appointment of electors, or in the case of the return of two or more votes of electors to ascertain the rightful set, and then considering this to go back and behind all for that purpose? There is no such authority given. There is nothing provided if there should be a contest as to electors. There is not an allusion to a case of the kind. The duty of the President of the Senate and of the two Houses is as simple as words can make it. And can we upon these words ingraft a whole system for contest and ascertainment?

The framers of the Constitution evidently never contemplated any such things as have transpired within the last eight or ten years. They took it for granted that the States would appoint electors, and in whatever manner it suited each State; that they would cast their votes, and that that was the end of their functions and of the action of the State, and that as they were sovereign bodies in this respect they would see to it that this important act should not be left in doubt or in any manner wanting in legal validity, and that, each State so speaking, the only simple duty was to receive the certificates, open them, and count the votes as given by the electors. The States were given the power to appoint the electors in any way they pleased, and it was supposed that the power would be so exercised and so conclusively exercised that all that in any way could follow would be the simple count in the presence of both Houses. It was contemplated by the Constitution that this most important act was final upon the part of the State and placed by its own action beyond cavil or controversy.

What is contemplated in the inquiry proposed by referring the electoral votes either to a committee appointed under the amendment of the Senator from Vermont or to the tellers to be examined in the presence of both Houses or by the Houses separately in case objection is made—what have we to be examined? Can we go back and inquire into the manner in which the electoral votes were cast? Can we go back and inquire into the manner in which the electors were appointed? Can we go back to ascertain whether they were legally appointed or elected by the people? Into what inquiry in either aspect of the case are we allowed to go? I think it must be conceded that if under this clause of the Constitution when the two Houses are assembled together for that purpose the votes must then and there be counted, it was intended that there should be no inquiry. If, however, we are permitted to inquire, then how is it to be done? In separate Houses or as a joint body? We meet as a joint body. The votes can only be counted in our presence. Shall we infer therefore that we have in separate bodies the right to investigate and reject? Is each House to examine into the manner in which the electors were appointed or how they discharged their duty? Is each House to investigate separately as to whether electors have been appointed or how appointed, or which are the rightful ones in cases of two or more sets of electors? Can this all be done as the Constitution now exists? Can it be done under the phrase "the votes shall then be counted?" Can each House, acting separately, under that phrase enter into an investigation, summon witnesses, and determine controversies about votes? Can this be done in either a joint or in separate assembly or before the committee that is to be appointed under the amendment of the Senator from Vermont? No, sir. I think not; the power is not broad enough. In fact we are but the witnesses of an act. We are summoned to see the certificates opened and the votes then to be counted. As to the latter we may be a ministerial body, in the performance of a single duty, the counting of the votes as the certificates so opened may disclose. Beyond that our duty and our power cease.

"The votes shall then be counted." I do not care how wide, how expanded, and how extended you make the word "then," you cannot have a contest in its real sense before you under that word. You are limited to one simple inquiry, and that is as to what the certificate may show when it is opened; if there be no votes shown as cast by the certificate that is the end of it, and the vote of the State is lost. We cannot go back; there can be nothing behind it; if there be error that error remains, not to be corrected. In those simple words there is no time for nor chance for correction. If there be two sets of returns, one must be right and the other wrong, or both must be wrong—both cannot be right, for with that you would have too many electors. But how inquire, how contest, how investigate? If at all, it ought to be done in joint convention or assembly, for the count is a high act and to be done in the presence of a united body. It would be anomalous to count a result in two separate bodies, it being an act that cannot admit of separation. But the prominent fact is that the framers never contemplated that there could be a contest, that there could be duplicate returns, and accordingly made no provision for it.

In the bill now before us you allow either House to except to the count of electoral votes where there be two returns made from a State. What are you to do then? The two Houses are to separate and to determine the question, and in case they disagree the vote shall not be counted. Have you that power? I think not. But what are you to do in such a case? Vote blindly to receive or reject? If not, what kind of an examination can you have? You have two sets of electoral votes, two returns laid before you, each set apparently duly certified. Are you then to inquire into the fact which set of electors are entitled to cast the votes? And this involves the inquiry further, which set was appointed; and if elected by the people, which did receive a majority of the votes of the people? Take the case of Louisiana, where two sets of electors were returned at the last election; how is it to be determined? It was not then, nor can you frame a law under this language of the Constitution that can at all be satisfactory. Can there be a contest? Is there any provision for it? When these two sets of electoral votes are before us, can we summon witnesses or have depositions taken for the purpose of showing which set of electors received a majority of the votes cast in the State, or whether they were properly appointed? That would not be then upon that occasion counting the votes. I do not think the language of the Constitution covers such a contested election, and yet the anomaly is this, that though we have not the right thus to examine into the fact whether certain electors were really and in fact elected by the people or not, we are required by this bill to separate and determine that question and all other questions that may arise as to such votes or certificates. And a difference is to settle the question as to the vote of the State—two separate tribunals deciding with equal power upon a fact they are required, if required at all, to see solved in joint meeting.

I differ also with the Senator from Vermont in the idea that the district court of the United States can determine upon a quo warranto who is President of the United States. I deny it. True we are limited in the count of electoral votes; our power being very narrow, as I have before said; yet when the votes are counted in the presence of both Houses as directed by the Constitution, it is conclusive upon the fact, and no earthly tribunal can review this ascertainment. Whenever it is ascertained and declared in the presence of both branches of Congress that such and such a person has received a majority of the electoral votes, that ends the subject so far as all judicial tribunals in this land are concerned. Our action here, though thus limited in our powers, though thus not permitted to go into a contest and to inquire whether the electors have been appointed properly or improperly, whether they have been elected by the people or not, if counted is conclusive upon all other tribunals. It is the decision of a tribunal specially appointed to see the count made. The count is all there that is to be made; but that being made, no tribunal can go behind it.

Adopt the principle here contended for and there is danger that you will make this an arena for all kinds of election tumults and disturbances. We cannot attend to any such thing. It is evident from this limited power conferred by the Constitution that it was never contemplated by the framers of it that there would be any trouble, because with the appointment of the electors the duties of the States ended and ours was only to count their votes. The framers never apprehended the troubles which have been upon us for the past eight or ten years. We never had any before. But, this upon us, would it not be well for us to provide in time by a constitutional amendment for the troubles that we will in vain attempt to avert by legislation?

I do not see, then, the necessity for this legislation. I know that if any are disposed to give trouble now, they can make it under the twenty-second joint rule and so they can under this bill. If there is a determination to revolutionize, if there is a determination to overthrow and subvert the will of the people by revolutionary or arbitrary action, it can be done under the present joint rule or under the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana. My trouble lies not with the details of the rule or of the bill, but in the fact that neither of them is authorized by the Constitution of the United States and neither of them provide adequate safety. My hope is that the Senate will recommit this subject, pass it by for the present in the hope that as things begin to look now the people of the country are not ready for disturbances and that right measurably would be done at the next presidential election, and that in the mean time we could do by a constitutional amendment what would obviate the difficulties which now surround the subject and that would so plainly indicate the manner in which the great question of the election of a President of the United States should be determined so that there could be no future trouble in having it settled in a fixed manner, not to be tampered with by legislation and that would be acceptable to the people.

That was my desire; and therefore the more I read of this bill, the more I read the twenty-second joint rule, the more concern it gives me, because I see the utter want of constitutional power to determine the election of President of the United States by any rules or laws that we may make outside of the counting of the certificates as they are handed by the Vice-President to the tellers and counted in the presence of both Houses of Congress. From the year 1793 down to 1865 the Vice-President always discharged that duty unexceptionably. He handed the certificates to the tellers and the seals were broken and the contents proclaimed in the presence of both Houses and the votes counted. All other questions save only the count were pretermitted. In fact and in truth, when we come to consider the matter, that was infinitely preferable to the danger of undertaking to exclude the votes of States by raising objection probably to some technical defects that might appear on the face of the papers and then by separate action exclude the count.

In fact when you look at the twenty-second joint rule and when you look at the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana, and also at the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, you see at last that they all are confined to an abstract, dry legal question whether the returns upon their face are right; for there is no machinery provided for any kind of an investigation beyond; no details in the bill or amendment by which truth as to any fact may be ascertained, but everything is left to the papers, or certificates, and it may be to our own personal knowledge of events either historical or personal. Instead, therefore, of making trouble by indifferent and inefficient legislation, we should direct our thoughts to an amendment of the Constitution by which ample provision could be made for manifest omissions—rather say not omissions, but for the manifest changes of times which have taken place since the adoption of the Constitution and the present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration proposes "to provide for and regulate the mode of counting votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon." In my opinion the Constitution of the United States provides the only mode for counting those votes, and I have very grave doubt as to whether any law enacted on that subject can have any force, especially if it conflict at all with what has been the practice under the constitutional provision.

As between the twenty-second joint rule and the bill now before the Senate, I am not satisfied that the bill under discussion is any better in its effect or will prove of more advantage than the twenty-second joint rule; but one question with me is as to the power of Congress to determine anything about this matter. The Constitution has fixed how the votes shall be counted. The two Houses are to meet in joint convention and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, is to open, according to the constitutional requirement, the votes of the several States, which are then to be counted. I concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] that it must be done at that time, and that the result then arrived at and then announced determines this whole question.

I am not satisfied, in the first place, of the power of Congress to enact any valid law on the subject, and I think the best thing that could now be done would be to repeal the twenty-second joint rule and leave the question just where the framers of the Constitution left it. I do not apprehend that we should have much difficulty under the constitutional provision; we have lived under it up to the present time; we never did have any difficulty. Even in 1861, when, perhaps, there was as much excitement in the country as there ever had been over the result of any presidential election, with a Vice-President in the chair who was himself a candidate for the Presidency, the vote for Mr. Lincoln was counted and the country acquiesced in the fairness of the result. I apprehend that if we repeal the twenty-second joint rule and leave this whole question just where the Constitution leaves it, we shall never have any difficulty in this country in counting and ascertaining the result of a presidential election.

For this reason I wish I could induce my friend from Indiana to let this bill go over for the present, or to amend the present bill so as simply to repeal the twenty-second joint rule. I would concur in that. At present I see no safety under the present bill or under the joint rule, and therefore I think it better to leave the question where the Constitution left it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I wish to add a few words to what I said a while ago touching the manner in which an election for President and Vice-President of the United States may be contested. For one I do not believe that Congress or any national authority has any right to contest the election of President and Vice-President. The American people do not elect the President as a mass. They do not elect the President as the American people. They elect the President as the people of the several States and exercising their rights as citizens of the several States. The manner of the election of President is one of those provisions in the Constitution which recognize, and not only recognize but provide for and uphold, the autonomy of the States. The people of the States as citizens of those States, and as making up the people of the States, elect a President. The Constitution provides in these words:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Thus it appears that the people do not vote for President directly, they vote to elect a certain number of electors who assemble at a time and place fixed by law to elect the President; and therefore if the people of a State should decline to vote for President there is no power to compel them to do it. The Federal Government is not so much interested in having a State vote as the State itself is. If a State shall see fit to decline to vote for President at all, there is no power to compel the people of that State to vote for President, nor is there any power conferred on Congress to compel the people of the State to have an election for President at all. It is a matter within the control of the people of the State through their Legislature. The Legislature may provide that the people may elect a certain number of electors to vote for President and Vice-President. The Legislature may provide that they themselves shall elect the electors. They may provide that the governor may appoint them. They may provide that the supreme court may appoint or the chief justice may appoint them, or they may provide so many appointers to appoint electors to cast the vote of the State for President and Vice-President. The whole matter is within the jurisdiction of the States, each for itself.

It has been asked, suppose there are great frauds practiced in the States in an election of President and Vice-President, as is sometimes the case in that election as in other elections. There is no power conferred in the Constitution on the national authority to contest the election in that behalf. The authority remains in the State to provide for that. It is true that in the history of this Government it does not appear that any State ever has provided for a contest of the election of electors of President and Vice-President; but it does not follow, therefore, that the State might not have done it. A good many powers are conferred on various authorities by the Constitution that have never yet been exercised, and I do not think I go too far when I say that the American people and the Congress of the Union and the authorities of the Union have to learn a good many things yet about the Constitution. It is an instrument that is not yet fully comprehended by the most learned men in the land.

I maintain that it is perfectly competent under the Constitution for the Legislatures of the several States to provide for contesting the election for President and Vice-President, in order to ascertain whether the people are directed to elect, whether A B, C D, and E F were elected electors by the people according to law. They might provide that the Legislature should contest it and that the contest should be decided by the Legislatures of the several States. They might provide that the Supreme Court should decide it. They might provide that a commission created by a law passed by the Legislature should determine whether the election was fairly held, and who were elected electors. So if the Legislature elected, they might by law provide for ascertaining whether the electors were fairly elected by the Legislature. So if the Legislature should confer power on the Governor to appoint, there might be a tribunal constituted to contest the matter and see whether or not the governor had fairly appointed so many men to be electors to vote for President and Vice-President.

It is a matter with which the Federal authorities, I repeat, have no concern whatsoever. It is a matter with the State, and when it is determined by the State, Congress cannot inquire into the election any more than Congress, when the people of a State have voted for governor and the proper authorities have decided that he was elected governor, can go on and determine that question again. I suppose no one will seriously pretend that if an election is held in New York, and the proper authorities of New York ascertain that A B has been elected, Congress may inquire into that matter and ascertain whether the election was conducted fairly, whether he was in fact elected. That is a matter that pertains to the State, of which the State authorities alone have jurisdiction, and of which the Federal authority has no jurisdiction whatever.

So in the election of President and Vice-President the election, so far as the State is concerned, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the several States. I admit that the States have not heretofore provided a tribunal for such contests, but that does not prove that they might not have so provided. I believe they could have so provided. I believe that it is important that they should so provide, that every State should pass a statute regulating the manner and providing a tribunal for contesting the election of electors of President and Vice-President, just as they have a tribunal before which to contest the election of a governor or any other State officer; and therefore that difficulty is out of the way.

The only question that ever can arise before Congress must arise before it in joint session, and the Congress in joint session, in exercising the powers conferred upon it as a joint body, can only determine whether a vote that is sent to the President of the Senate is the vote that was ascertained by the authorities of the State, and when that is ascertained that is the end of the controversy. If the certificate of election was so informal that it did not show that there was an election, Congress would have the power to say "it does not appear that any election was held in North Carolina," but Congress has no power to say that the election held for electors of President and Vice-President in North Carolina was fraudulent, that democratic electors ought to have been elected whereas the returns show that republican electors were elected, or vice versa. When the State authorities have determined the matter, there is the end of the controversy and Congress cannot inquire into it. The election of electors of President by the people of the State or by the authorities of the State as provided by the Constitution is a matter of greater moment to the State than to the Federal Government. It is a matter with them. If they choose to elect, they have the privilege and the right to do it. If they choose to abstain from voting, there is no Federal authority or power that can compel them to vote.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel it to be my duty to move to amend the bill now by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That within not more than ten and not less than three days next prior to the last Monday in January next following any election for President or Vice-President, the Senate shall appoint four Senators and the House of Representatives shall appoint four members, and such eight persons shall constitute a Committee upon Elections of President and Vice-President. A majority of said committee shall be a quorum thereof, and the concurrence of such majority shall be necessary in any action thereof. Each member of such committee shall, before he enters upon the duties by this act imposed on such committee, take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully and impartially perform all the duties imposed upon me by the act entitled 'An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President;' so help me God."

And such oaths of Senators shall be filed in the archives of the Senate, and of members of the House of Representatives in the archives of the House.

SEC. 2. That Congress shall be in session on the last Monday in January next after any election for President and Vice-President shall have occurred; and the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at one o'clock, afternoon of that day, and from day to day, (Sundays excepted,) at the same hour, until the duties required by this act shall have been performed; the President of the Senate shall preside, and whenever the Senate shall withdraw, from time to time, the Speaker of the House shall resume his chair; having so met, the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of votes given at the last preceding election for President and for Vice-President, respectively, and which shall have come to his possession; and the votes shall then be counted in the manner and with effect hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That when the certificates of votes for President of the United States shall be opened by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, as provided in the Constitution and by this act, the same shall, with the votes therein contained or stated, be then and there delivered to the committee provided for in section 1 of this act; which committee shall forthwith proceed to examine the same, and shall count the votes which shall appear to have been legally given and duly certified and returned. And said committee shall report in writing as soon as may be to said meeting their proceedings, the state of the votes, and what persons, if any, have been pursuant to law elected President and Vice-President respectively; and if, on such report, any question shall be made by any Senator or member of the House of Representatives touching the legal validity of any vote or votes so delivered to said committee, or touching any action of said committee, the Senate shall withdraw, and each House shall proceed to consider the question; and if the two Houses concur in the decision thereof, their judgment shall stand, and the report of such committee shall be modified accordingly; but if they do not so concur, the report of such committee shall stand; and if such committee shall be equally divided in opinion, the vote in question shall be counted unless both Houses concur in rejecting the same. And the persons so declared elected shall respectively be deemed entitled to exercise the functions of their offices.

SEC. 4. That section 142 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and all provisions inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to explain this amendment any more than I have already done, which only as I conceive it furnishes an additional security and safeguard in the inspection and scrutinizing of the papers coming from States purporting to be votes; and when it comes to be a disputed question, it leaves it substantially where the bill of the Senator from Indiana leaves it.

Mr. MORTON. I do not intend to discuss this amendment. I have already said that I think this amendment is as dangerous and does embrace most of the dangers of the present twenty-second joint rule. I think it is unsafe in every respect, and I know of no advantage to be derived from it. It would be fatal to the bill if it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word upon this question, and I shall not detain the Senate at this time of the evening longer than a few moments.

I have listened attentively to this debate, and the conclusion of my mind is that it never was intended that the two Houses of Congress in separate session in their own Chambers should legislate on this subject at all. The power given by the Constitution of the United States as to counting the electoral votes is for the Vice-President to count the votes in the presence of the two bodies. The power commences there; it commences at no moment before they are so assembled; and I have heard nothing in this debate from the commencement to the end of it which answers that objection. You will recollect, Mr. President, that that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of Senators requires that they shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the States. Under that clause, as is well known, various manners of elections sprang up. Some Legislatures elected in separate session of the two houses, and failing to agree went into joint session, as they do now, voting as they do per capita under the existing law of Congress. Congress had the right to provide a manner, but at that time had not provided. Other Legislatures elected in joint meeting at once. The objection was made that the joint meeting was not the Legislature, that it was not the power that legislated, that passed bills. The decisions and precedents were otherwise and have been otherwise. They did not meet in that capacity to pass laws; they met under the Constitution of the United States as a joint body for the purpose of having an election; and they claimed the right and exercised it, whenever they met in joint meeting, to make the rules that indicated the manner of their making their choice.

It seems to me that our fathers never did contemplate that this power of deciding upon the legality of a vote should ever come before Congress at all, either in its legislative capacity, sitting each House in its own Chamber as a separate body, or when sitting together for the purpose of counting the votes. I think it never did occur to them that such a question could or ever would come up. It may be that it is a case that ought to be provided for by constitutional amendment, but that is not the question with us now. The question is whether we shall by legislation, sitting in different chambers long before the moment comes when our power begins, make a law which will control the action of that body to whom, and to whom alone, the Constitution of the United States has committed that power. It may be that it is a mere ministerial power. I have no doubt it was meant to be that and nothing else by the Constitution and those who framed it. But whether it be a ministerial power, or whether it goes further and includes the right to decide upon the legality of the votes, the body can get no right from your legislation. Will any Senator insist that any more power than the Constitution has given to these two bodies sitting under that clause of the Constitution can be given to them by legislation by each House in separate bodies? No Senator will insist on that. If so, why should you act in reference to the case of how they shall decide when two parties from the same State present different certificates of election? Why should you provide for that if you can give them no more power than they have; and certainly it must be so?

I really think, without the slightest desire to reopen this debate at this moment, that we are acting unwisely in attempting to pass any law on this subject at this time of night and at this stage of the session. I think it will be found that so far from doing away with the difficulty which undoubtedly exists, which all admit exists, we are getting ourselves in more trouble and undertaking to do what we have not power to do. If a constitutional amendment is not necessary, then those two bodies there assembled have the power to regulate the way they shall count the vote, and if they have not the power it certainly does not exist in these two bodies sitting before the Congress meets, before the body to whom the Constitution of the United States has committed the power to count the next vote of presidential electors has convened. At a session before they are elected, you are here making laws to prevent them from doing that which was committed to them alone, and not to you, by the Constitution of the United States.

I do not know that I should have said a word on this subject if it had not struck me that the amendment offered a few moments ago by the Senator from Vermont was a better bill, if a bill must be passed, than the bill we have been discussing which has been offered by the Senator from Indiana. I think the discussion has shown some of the difficulties of the case; and some of them possibly are avoided (not those I have mentioned, but some others that have been spoken of by other gentlemen) by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont; and yet that amendment comes in at this moment. It is a question of too much importance to be acted upon at such a moment as this without consideration, without time to examine even whether the amendment is better than the original bill, and yet the question is put upon the amendment and is voted down, and now we are on the eve of passing the bill when many gentlemen really do not know what was the precise effect of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I think it is unwise. While I perceive that the majority of this body mean to pass this bill to-night, I simply desire to enter my protest against a subject of so much importance being legislated upon in this way. I certainly for one—I know there are others—most earnestly desire an opportunity of reading carefully the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I think that amendment would be adopted in preference to the bill of the Senator from Indiana if we had an opportunity of examining it; but it is voted down without a division, simply because not one-half the Senate heard it read, and I presume not many of the Senators knew what it did contain nor the the advantages it might possess over the bill of the Senator from Indiana.

I need not say that I do not look upon this question as a party question at all, and I do not suppose any gentleman can. I have therefore refrained from speaking of it because I wished to listen to those who were wiser than myself, who have had more experience. I have listened carefully and attentively, and have simply made up my mind on a consideration of the whole matter. I am driven, as I said before, to the conclusion that it is not a subject for our legislation at all.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the close of the bill:

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon.

I desire to ask the honorable Senator if the meaning of the bill is that the second day closes the action of the two Houses upon this subject necessarily.

Mr. MORTON. Not necessarily.

Mr. EATON. Then I think the bill is very imperfect if in the opinion of the framer and manager of the bill the session does not close with the ordinary day; but there should be a time when it should close, so as not to run on until the 4th of March. There should be some definite time in the bill. I am not prepared to offer an amendment, for I hardly knew what the opinion of the honorable Senator was.

Mr. MORTON. I hardly think any amendment is necessary. The Senator will observe that in the first section the time of counting the votes is fixed on the last Wednesday in January, which is two weeks earlier than is now provided by law. That was intended to give plenty of time in case there should be questions of difficulty arising, in order to give time to consider and have the whole matter determined before the 4th of March.

Mr. EATON. My impression is that there should be something definite as to this point, if the bill is to pass. I am not prepared to offer an amendment at this time. I am opposed to the passage of the bill; and I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a few moments in stating why.

I agree in brief with what was said by my distinguished friend from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.] It is not in the power of this Congress to pass this law. It is a void law if passed. For three-quarters of a century the good people who represented their fellow-citizens here were satisfied with the Constitution of the United States; and let me read the Constitution to see whether there is any necessity for the bill. It is well to read it. It will not harm anybody to hear it. Article 12 of the amendments provides:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted—

I have no trouble about whom the count is to be by, though there has seemed to be some little trouble on that subject—

the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately—

That means the next day—

by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote.

That is all I care to read.

Mr. President, I said that I did not propose to go into a lengthy discussion of this question; but I say in advance one thing, not for the purpose of casting any reflection upon any honorable member of this Senate—far be that from me—that I look upon any bill for a public act of this character, that is brought forward in this Chamber without anybody to say anything in its favor, as suspicious, to say the least. There has been no discussion, not a word, not a breath in favor of the principles contained in this bill. And has it come to this at last, that a bill is to be passed in these the last hours of the session, probably unconstitutional, by the mere force of numbers, without one word of argument in its favor? I say, Mr. President, it is suspicious. For seventy-five years the people of this country acted under the Constitution of the United States. They can now. The court is here. I defy any Senator on this floor to show any state of facts where under the Constitution, without any bill for a public act, without any rule of the two Houses, we cannot go on and perform all the duties that are devolved upon us in this behalf. Some Senators say that it is impossible that it can be done. Let us hear why; give a reason for it, and do not simply rely on a large vote to pass a measure of this character. I say it is suspicious.

Again, it was alleged with great power by my distinguished friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that if there was any necessity for a bill of this character it should be passed at the next session of Congress; it should not be a party measure. I appeal to every Senator on the other side of the Chamber on that point. They, like I—the mantle of charity covers us all—desire proper action, not improper. Can it be had at any better time than when this Senate is under the control of the republicans—if terms expressing party names are to be used here? I have not been in the habit of using them in legislative assemblies; it has been forbidden by the rules of such assemblies where I have served, and it ought to be here—where and when the dominant party on this floor will be in the majority for the coming two years; while on the other floor, at the other end of the Capitol, the other party, the party to which I am attached, will be in the majority? If there be any necessity for a rule, which I deny, is there not patriotism enough in both parties to get such a rule as is proper and just? There is no President to be elected next January. Two years must elapse. Why, then, in hot haste, without proper consideration, pass this measure of doubtful constitutionality at the best? Will some gentleman tell us why? Give us the necessity for it. Let us know why you do it; why your appropriation bills, your tax bills, your other bills of importance lie upon the floor or on or under your table, and you harp away upon a measure which cannot be of use for two years. It is suspicious at least.

And why is this a bill for a public act, I beg to ask? Why not amend your rule if your rule is not right? Why a bill for a public act that cannot be repealed until you have a President and a Senate and a House of Representatives to agree to repeal it? Where is the necessity for that? I say, Mr. President, that this bill ought not to be passed in this manner. I should like some honorable Senator on the other side of the Chamber to give a reason for it. Is there such a necessity for it, that everything else must go by the board, that a bill to pay old men eighty years of age must be put on the table or refused to be taken up, men that will die before this bill can be of any service, whether it be proper or improper? O, no, this bill must be taken up; you will not pass anything that is necessary, that the honor of the country demands should be passed, but you will prefer and pass a bill for which there is no earthly use for years and that without a single reason having been given for it. I do not like to characterize it as a party measure. I do not like to say either that any honorable Senator on this floor has given birth to a measure of that character or that any other honorable Senator is supporting the measure because it is a mere partisan measure. I simply say, and no man will deny it, that there is no use for it for years. If you pass it now, you pass it with that imputation hanging over you and you cannot avoid it. There is no use for it. If the election was to be held next January, if the election was to be held in a month or two months, and gentlemen felt that there was a necessity for a bill of this character, then I agree it would be their absolute duty to pass it; but no such necessity exists. It is not here.

Mr. President, not to take up the time of the Senate on this subject, as I said I should not, I simply wish to protest against legislation of this character. It is not consonant to the spirit of the Constitution of the United States which I am here to maintain and defend.

I move the indefinite postponement of the bill now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORWOOD, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. GORDON, (after first voting in the affirmative.) Upon this question the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] is paired with myself, and I voted inadvertently. I therefore desire to have my name stricken from the roll. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. STEVENSON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. CONKLING. I am opposed to the bill as it now stands, and although it is a matter of little consequence on this motion which way I vote, I will vote "yea," the motion being to postpone indefinitely, as I understand.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. KELLY. I am requested to state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] Mr. BOGY would vote "yea" and Mr. ALLISON "nay."

Mr. TIPTON. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] left the Chamber under the impression that I was paired with him on this subject, and I will not therefore vote. I am paired with him on another question if it comes up, but as he was of the impression that the pair extended to this question, I desire to be excused from voting.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Carpenter, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hager, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Ransom, and Stockton—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Boreman, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Washburn, West, and Windom—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Brownlow, Cameron, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—28.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass.

Messrs. BAYARD, CONKLING, and SPRAGUE demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I have but a single word to say on this bill. I will not at this hour and at this stage of the debate undertake to go at length into its merits. The twenty-second joint rule as it stands is in my judgment objectionable. Perhaps I might say something more; I think I may say it is a dangerous provision and questionable in several respects. It is proposed to obviate it by the adoption of a statute which I think more objectionable, more likely to invite difficulty, more likely to forecast disturbance and trouble in the counting of the presidential vote. I said in the beginning that I would not inflict on the Senate a discussion of the subject or a statement of my reasons, but having looked at the bill as carefully as I can, that is my judgment, and I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] complained somewhat that there had been nothing said in favor of this bill. I have abstained from argument because I wanted a vote. The questions involved in this bill have been discussed on this floor for several years past, and I supposed the Senate was agreed on the question that the twenty-second joint rule ought to be repealed and that there ought to be some provision made by law to prevent the imminent danger of a collision at the counting of the presidential vote. This rule was adopted in 1865 under which as it now stands a single objection, however trifling in its character, will cause the two Houses to separate and to vote separately upon that objection, and unless both Houses agree in overruling the objection the vote is lost.

There is nothing partisan in this bill. It is as fair for one party as it is for another, and I regret that our democratic friends have been found voting unanimously for the indefinite postponement of this bill and I presume they will unanimously vote against the bill on its final passage. There is nothing partisan in it; and if I were disposed to seek for motives of a party character, I might turn around and say in reply to my friend from Connecticut that as the next House of Representatives will be democratic, and as it is in the power under the present rule of either House to throw the election into the House of Representatives by sustaining objections, therefore there was a strong democratic interest in preserving this rule as it is; for if this rule shall stand as it is, when we come to count the presidential vote in February, 1877, and objection is made to the vote of any State, however trifling in its character, unless that objection is overruled by both Houses, the democratic House concurring in overruling it, the election will be thrown into the House of Representatives and the democratic party will then elect the President. If I were disposed to hunt for party motives, I might find them in the existence of that fact. I might therefore account for a solid democratic vote against this bill; but I have attributed no personal or partisan motives to anybody. I had earnestly hoped that there would be no party feeling about this bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] who has made an argument in favor of this bill and I believe will vote for it, is certainly governed by no party considerations in the matter. He has risen above them, and he for one is not willing to have that temptation left to the next House of Representatives, for a great temptation would be the power by sustaining an objection to throw the election of President into their own body.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator suppose that the temptation would be any greater with the next House than it has been with preceding Houses?

Mr. MORTON. I will say to my friend that the two Houses have both been of the same political character since the adoption of this rule. This rule was adopted in 1865. Up to this time the country has not been exposed to the danger of having a House of a different political complexion from that of the Senate. If the twenty-second joint rule was abolished, it would throw it back simply to what it was before that time, and the danger of collision before that time was imminent. If any Senator will take the trouble to read the debate in the two Houses that occurred immediately after counting the vote for President and Vice-President in 1857, he will understand the narrow escape that the country made at that time. That was before there was any rule on the subject. When the vote was counted for Mr. Buchanan, objection was made to counting the vote of Wisconsin. The electoral vote had not been cast at the time prescribed by the act of Congress. The Constitution required all the States to vote on the same day. The framers of the Constitution thought that was a very important provision. The act of Congress fixed that time, the first Wednesday in December. The electors of Wisconsin did not meet on that day, but met on a day subsequent. It was objected that that vote ought not to be counted because it was not cast in conformity to the act of Congress. If the election had turned upon the vote of Wisconsin, as was said in the debate that took place both in the Senate and in the House the very day afterward, perhaps it would have resulted in an armed conflict and a revolution, but it was very fortunate that at that time Mr. Buchanan was elected without regard to the vote of Wisconsin. Mr. Mason, the president of the Senate, said that as the matter stood any motion to reject the vote of Wisconsin was not in order. No motion was in order, he said, but to count the vote. The vote of Wisconsin was counted. He then marched out of the House of Representatives and the Senate followed him, and this very interesting debate took place immediately afterward; and it seemed to be agreed on all hands in both Houses that there ought to be some rule adopted by which the great danger would be avoided when the election might turn upon the vote of some State that was in that condition. Therefore, although no collision has taken place up to this time, and although no trouble has come, yet we have seen in the election of 1868, we have seen in the election of 1872, that these things may happen, and it is the part of prudence to provide an act by which they shall be guarded against. This bill has been well considered; there is no advantage in it to any party; I believe it is fair; and I have therefore brought it before the Senate, and hope that it will be passed to secure the future peace and safety of our country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I feel obliged to vote against this bill, I wish to say a single word in justification of what I do, and I am not specially afraid of being found voting with the democrats if they vote this way; I do not know that they will. Every man must act upon his own conviction of duty.

To repeal the twenty-second joint rule is one thing which I may be and I think I am in favor of, because it is open to objection. To set up another rule, which is just as bad or worse, which to my mind this bill does, is quite a different thing. If this were simply a proposition to repeal the twenty-second joint rule, I think as at present advised I should vote for it. But it is a proposition not only to do that, but to set up another rule in its stead which in my opinion opens a broader ground for collision, as my honorable friend from Indiana calls it, a broader ground for difficulty and doubt than the present rule. It is in effect to say that any spurious or revolutionary vote which may be brought forward from people pretending to be the electors of a State shall be counted, unless both Houses agree that it shall not. It is not brought forward for decision, but it stands because it comes as the authoritative voice of the people until the two Houses concur in saying it is not a vote. The twenty-second joint rule is not open to that objection. That requires consideration. So it appears to me that the rule provided by this bill is more dangerous to the public peace than the twenty-second joint rule. But as I say it is not a choice between these two, because we can omit to pass this bill and still repeal the twenty-second joint rule.

When the electors meet on the first Wednesday in December in each one of the States, the Constitution entitles us to know, entitles everybody to know that the persons who thus meet are the electors. It entitles the people of the United States to know in some way under a government of law that what those who claim to be electors send to the capital is the vote of the State lawfully and constitutionally given. Now, the Senator's bill says that whatever comes from that State purporting to be this thing shall decide who shall be President, unless the two Houses concur in saying that it is inadmissible. I think that is more dangerous than the twenty-second joint rule. I do not want to enlarge upon it, for I have not the time.

Mr. MORTON. I must say one word in reply to that, and I confess my surprise. When I brought forward a proposition the other day to repeal the twenty-second joint rule my friend opposed it, thought there ought to be a law on the subject, and he himself brought forward a bill involving the same principle as this bill, with this difference, that he interposed a committee of eight persons, four Senators and four Representatives. In his amendment offered to-night he provided that when that committee made a report, that report should stand and the votes it reported to be counted should be counted unless that report was overruled by both Houses acting concurrently.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. MORTON. It involved the very principle in this bill, except that it finally brought it back to the twenty-second joint rule.

Now the Senator says this involves all the dangers of the twenty-second joint rule. What is the foundation for that? How can that be said? If we have no rule at all, the President of the Senate will open the return and hand it down and it will be counted and there is no power anywhere to prevent it from being counted. If you have no rule at all, as in the case of Wisconsin as was then decided, and both Houses agreed that as the matter stood the President had decided correctly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; they decided that there was no remedy, there was no law, there was no rule on the subject, and after discussing the matter it was dropped by common consent in both Houses. If we have no rule, whenever a vote is opened by the President of the Senate in the convention of the two Houses it must be counted, whatever may be the irregularity or the unlawfulness of it; there is no way to prevent it. That is the condition if you have no rule. Now, with the provisions of this bill, when a certificate is opened, if an objection is made, the Houses separate and deliberate upon it. If they both agree that the objection is good, then the vote is not counted; but if they do not agree that the objection is good, then the vote is to be counted. But as the rule now stands, if an objection is made, however trifling and contemptible, unless both Houses do agree in overruling it, the vote of the State is thrown out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or however valid it may be.

Mr. MORTON. Or however valid it may be. You have under this bill the judgment of both Houses. In other words, under this bill you cannot disfranchise a State except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses. Under the rule as it now stands one House can disfranchise a State. Without any rule every vote must be counted, no matter how false, how fraudulent, how unlawful it may be. That is the simple situation, and without a rule every vote must be counted. With the rule as it now stands one House can disfranchise New York and Indiana. Under this law no State can be disfranchised except by the combined judgment of the two Houses. I say that is in analogy with our form of government. It is conformable to reason, and in my opinion it is safe.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. Why does he say that in the absence of a rule every vote must be counted?

Mr. MORTON. Simply because there is no way of getting clear of the count. That was held in 1857; and if my friend has ever taken the trouble to read the discussion that took place in both Houses then, lasting two or three days, a very earnest and very able one, he will see the difficulties we labored under at that time and the conclusion that the able Senators and members then in Congress came to.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, as I have said before in the debate to-day, I should greatly prefer that this legislation should not take place at this session, but that it should be deferred until the next Congress. In saying that I mean no imputation upon anybody of either House. Nor do I mean to say that a better bill could probably be passed by the next Congress than the bill now before us. But I do say that a bill passed by a Congress, one House of which belonged to one of the great parties of the country and the other to the other, would be more likely to be satisfactory to the country and to remain the permanent law of the land than a bill passed in the expiring hours of a Congress two years nearly before the act can have any operation or effect. I should have been glad, therefore, if the majority of this body had consented to let this bill go by this session and make it the subject of legislation next winter. But the majority have seen fit to do otherwise, and we are brought to the consideration of the bill.

Now, I wish to say in answer to some remarks made by the Senator from Indiana that I have not been influenced in my course upon this subject by any apprehensions of what the next House of Representatives would do, nor do I share in any apprehension expressed by the Senator from Indiana, nor do I believe there is any ground for their existence. He seems to think that if the present twenty-second joint rule is left to govern us, the next House of Representatives may throw out the vote of a State in order to make the election of President devolve upon the House of Representatives.

In the first place that is to impute to that House improper motive. It is not to be presumed that the House would throw out improperly the vote of a State any more than it is to be presumed that the Senate would do it. It is not to be presumed of either body that it would thus violate its sworn duty to maintain the Constitution of the Republic. If the House should vote to reject a certificate from a State, the presumption is that in the opinion of the House there was good cause for its rejection, just as if the Senate should vote to reject it the presumption would be that in the opinion of the Senate there was good cause to reject it; and therefore it is not to be supposed for a moment that the House would proceed in violation of the sworn duty of its members and in a factious and revolutionary spirit to defeat the will of the people by throwing out the vote of a State which clearly ought to be counted. But if there were any such danger, let me say to the Senator from Indiana that it will exist under his bill; that he cannot get rid of it upon his interpretation of the Constitution. How is it that he supposes that the election may be devolved upon the House of Representatives by the revolutionary proceeding that he has imagined? It rests upon this theory that the person who is declared elected by the people must receive a majority of the votes of all the electors who shall have been appointed by the States; and that is the literal reading of the Constitution in article 12 of the amendments. In the original Constitution it was declared that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The amended article declares that—

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

Giving a literal interpretation to this language, the Senator from Indiana construes the Constitution to mean that if a return should be cast out for any other reason than that the persons making that return were not electors, then, although that return could not be counted, Congress would be bound to take notice of the fact of the appointment of those electors and count them upon the question whether any individual had received a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. It is a very hard thing to suppose a case of that kind, and yet we might suppose it. In fact, it actually occurred in the case of Wisconsin. There the electors were appointed; there there was no question but that they were appointed; there there was no question as to their just title to the office of electors; and the objection to the reception of the return made by them was that they had cast the vote on a day different from that provided in the law.

There it might be said electors were appointed, and Congress is bound to take notice of the fact that they were appointed; and therefore no one could be President unless he received a majority of all the electors appointed, including these whose votes were rejected. That is one interpretation of the Constitution. It is certainly the literal interpretation, but it is open to argument whether that is the true interpretation of that instrument.

However, I do not wish to go into that argument now. That is not a case likely to occur. If votes are rejected it is not likely to be a case in which the evidence before us will satisfy us of the appointment and make it our duty to say that electors were appointed at the same time that we reject their certificates. That is a case that I think is very unlikely to occur, but even under this bill this difficulty might arise. Where there were double returns it might be that one return would be rejected, although both Houses should believe that the persons casting the votes in that return were the legal electors; and another return might be rejected through some informality. One return might be rejected because the persons casting the votes were not the legal electors, although the return itself might in every respect conform to the law. If either House were disposed to act factiously, to act in truth corruptly, to act in a revolutionary spirit, in a case where there were two returns, the very difficulty which the Senator supposes might occur under his bill. I do not believe there is danger of anything of that kind taking place, and therefore I have no idea that there is any necessity for passing this bill for the purpose of preventing a factious, corrupt, and revolutionary attempt on the part of the House of Representatives to defeat the will of the people and devolve the election on that House.

I do not know that I desire to say anything more on this subject. I shall be glad to have it laid over. I am free to say, however, that I believe this bill is better than the existing twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I shall vote against the measure before the Senate, because it introduces the President of the United States into a matter with which he has nothing to do under the Constituion, and brings him into a dangerous innovation. He is charged with the execution of all laws. This is to be a law. He is charged with its execution. When was it contemplated that a retiring President should have anything to do with the election of his successor? There is too much executive interference in elections now. To make it his duty to interfere is in my judgment most pernicious. I am opposed to the bill, therefore, because its tendency is such.

And to conclude. I have listened with pain to this discussion. It is apparent that men wisest in the land, or men supposed to be the wisest, think they can carry on the Government successfully leaving the great material powers among the people untouched, to drift, to act irregularly. Why, sir, the danger mentioned in counting the vote in 1857 was not a danger of that moment, but was nearly ripe from the material condition among the people. It is the irregular action of these affairs that will soon tumble your government structure into atoms, and then these discussions of mere laws and rules will appear in their true light: simply false and weak guides to ruin.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this subject is surrounded by difficulties, and my opinion is that it would be safer to leave it where it is in the Constitution without any legislation or rules. I believe it would be more likely to be right. It seems to me the difficulties attempted to be avoided are not met in this bill. In the first section it is provided that the vote shall be counted and the result declared, and that no State shall be rejected without the concurrence of the two Houses, acting separately. That of course would place it in the power of either House to retain a vote, although that vote might not be a proper vote. In any event you could not take it out of the power of either House to do wrong if they were disposed to do it.

But then the second section provides—

> That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

We have had two returns from the same State, and very likely if this law was passed it might invite two returns from a State. We might have several cases of that kind, and then the two Houses, acting separately, would have to determine affirmatively before a vote could be received. Suppose they disagree upon the returns, where would we be then?

Mr. LOGAN. It would not be counted.

Mr. STEWART. It would not be counted. The two Houses would disagree. There would be a long discussion. That case might arise. I think perhaps they would have disagreed on the vote of Louisiana the last time if this bill had been a law. They might have disagreed; I do not say they would have done it. You would have under this bill after a disagreement a long and heated discussion.

Then you have got in this bill another provision:

> Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared.

Then suppose one House would disagree and they would say, "You have no right until the votes are all counted to declare the result." It may be they would not go back to have the result declared. You have the very machinery here to produce great difficulties. What would be the probable result if you had two sets of returns? The two Houses separate. One House would claim that one return should be counted, the other House claiming that the other return should be counted, and you could not get the two Houses back so that the result could be declared. The President of the Senate under this law would have no right to declare the result until all the votes were counted. It seems to me, under this bill, where there were two sets of returns that very question might lead to a revolution. I do not see how you could avoid it. The two Houses have separated, having disagreed; they get up a heated discussion. No result can be declared until the votes are counted, and the votes cannot be counted until the Houses agree, because there is no provision made for that.

I would much prefer to repeal the twenty-second joint rule and leave this question where the Constitution has left it. From the short provision in the Constitution it is very evident that the framers had considerable trouble at the time. It is very evident they could not agree upon any elaborate mode of doing it, and I think if it is left where they left it, it will be put nearly in the true place. The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

I think it was anticipated that they should just count them and he should declare the result. In that case you get a President, but under this bill you might have a civil war before you get a President; and if you do not declare the result there might be a pretext for it. In this case there will be no President, no declaration, nothing to swear to according to law. You have separated the two Houses, got up a heated discussion upon a disagreement, and there is a provision in the bill that the result shall not be declared until the votes are all counted. One House will be contending for one set of votes and the other House will be contending for another set of votes, and the Vice-President will not be allowed to declare the result. I say you have a state of things calculated to lead to rebellion. I cannot vote for this bill as it stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair.) The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LOGAN. I should not now say anything but that I see there is a disposition to talk on this bill. I was very sorry to hear my friend from Nevada say he would vote against this bill unless amended. I do not know that I have capacity enough to satisfy him that the objections he makes to this bill are without any good basis; but I can certainly satisfy myself of it. Let us see what his objections are.

First his objection to the bill is because if there are two returns from a State both Houses must concur in counting one or the other or they are not counted.

Now, I desire to call the attention of Senators who have any difficulty on this point to this proposition, and we will see where my friend will come out. Under the joint rule as it exists, if either House objects the vote is not counted at all, but if both Houses concur it is counted. That is the case under the rule.

Mr. STEWART. Under the existing rule the result would be declared in that case; but you here propose a legislative enactment which will prevent the declaration of the result.

Mr. LOGAN. Hold on! One point at a time. Let us see where you come out. Under the existing rule——

Mr. STEWART. I do not like the existing rule either.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I am speaking about things as they exist, and we are trying to better them. Under the rule as it exists if one House objects, then the vote cannot be counted at all, whether you have one State rejected or two. Under this bill we require the concurrence of both Houses. If both Houses do not concur to reject the vote, then the State has its right under the Constitution to its vote. That is the difference between the rule that exists and the rule that we propose to adopt. If two sets of returns are made to the Vice-President, the two Houses are to determine which returns shall be counted; and unless both concur as to which return shall be counted, none is counted. That is the result under the bill, but under the present rule one House can determine whether the vote of a State shall be counted. Here you require both Houses to determine that the vote is a fraud before you can reject it.

Under the Constitution both Houses are required to count the vote. Now, if it requires both Houses to count the vote, it should require both Houses to determine the votes, because the Constitution contemplates that both Houses form a convention for the purpose of determining these questions. That is the meaning of the Constitution. Both Houses then having formed a convention for the purpose of determining the votes, in this bill we provided that it shall require the assent of that convention—that is, the assent of both Houses—before a State shall be deprived of its right under the Constitution to have a vote.

That is the proposition in this bill. I defy any good lawyer to tell me why both Houses should not be consulted in reference to depriving a State of having a vote for President when both Houses are required to count the vote. Under your present rule one House may determine that which the Constitution requires both Houses to determine.

Let us see further. My friend from Nevada says that it will produce a revolution because both Houses are required to determine which one of all returns shall be counted. I will put this point to the Senator, or to any of the Senators who have made an objection to this particular section of the bill. When a State votes for President, I do not care if it makes one hundred returns, some one of these returns must be correct. If the people of the State vote at all they must have voted for some person. Under the present rule it makes no difference whether they vote for some person or not, you deprive them of the right to have it determined whom they voted for and to have their votes counted, but under this proposed rule you allow them to have a vote as is contemplated by the Constitution. You allow the convention of the two Houses to determine which one of these lists may be the right vote, according to the sentiments of the people when they voted for President and Vice-President. I ask any man to tell me what wrong there is in that proposition. Even in Louisiana, a State which we have been contending about, they did vote for somebody if we could ascertain it. No man can doubt that.

We provide then that when the State does vote for somebody the two Houses may determine whom that vote was cast for, and then give them credit for that vote when it is determined. In the present condition of things you deprive States of votes, but under this bill you provide so that States may vote and have their votes counted. Instead of its being calculated to produce revolution, it is calculated to produce peace and satisfaction to the people who vote for President that their votes shall be counted. If my State votes for President and Vice-President of the United States and one House of Congress undertakes to say that her vote shall not be counted and it is therefore rejected, I am dissatisfied; but when both Houses in convention under the Constitution determine that to be the fact, then I have no right to complain. But I would have a right to complain under the present condition of things.

A second objection is to the following clause in the bill:

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared.

My friend from Nevada objects to this because he says it would be interminable; that Congress might prevent the election of a President at all. Will the Senator stand up before this intelligent body and say that under the Constitution of the United States, without any joint rule or without any law, the two Houses can dissolve without having determined the result in any other way except by a reference to the House of Representatives? It is not contemplated that they shall dissolve until a President is declared to be elected; that is, until the result is declared. You may declare that no one is elected President and then it goes to the House, but under the Constitution you are expected and required to determine the result. Some result must be ascertained, either that some man has been elected President or that no man has been elected President. If no one is declared elected, then the House determines who shall be the President. This bill only provides that this convention shall not be dissolved until "the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared." What result? Either that there has been a President elected or that there has not been a President elected, so that if there has not been a President elected the House may then act and perform their functions under the Constitution.

You may take this bill and examine it. I know I have not perhaps given the consideration to it that some gentlemen have; but it was before the committee of which I am a member, and has been fairly considered and examined. It has been considered with a view to having the law framed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, so framed that neither one House nor the other should deny to a State the right to vote. I ask the Senator by what rule is it to-day that the Senate of the United States alone can determine that a State's vote shall not be counted in any election whatever except an election that applies only to its own body? By what rule can the Senate alone determine that a State cannot vote? By the joint action of the two Houses alone can this be determined, as I read and understand the Constitution. If there is anything unconstitutional, in my judgment it is the twenty-second rule, which permits one House by its solitary act to deny a State the right to vote in a presidential election.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator whether this bill, if it should become a law, would not put it within the power of one branch of Congress to compel the count of an unlawful vote?

Mr. LOGAN. It puts it in the power of one branch of Congress to not deny the State its vote. It does not put it in the power of one branch of Congress to say how the vote shall be or shall not be. Under the Constitution and under the rules that have been determined prior to the twenty-second joint rule it was held that Congress itself could not deny the right to count the vote.

Mr. MERRIMON. I can see the objection to the twenty-second joint rule. I am now speaking of this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I will state my answer to the Senator. Up to the time of the twenty-second joint rule it was held by the Congress of the United States that you could not deny a State its right to vote, whether it voted in accordance with law or not. Until that rule was established allowing one branch of Congress to deny the right of a State to vote, the right had not been denied. If it is held that one branch of Congress can deny a State the right to vote, is it not better that both branches of Congress shall have the power to deny it? Ought not both branches of Congress to have the right to determine the question of these votes? Would you have it that one branch shall determine that a State shall not vote, but that both branches cannot determine that she shall vote? I would ask the Senator if that is not the logic of his suggestion?

I will answer the Senator further. I would prefer, as a member of the Congress of the United States, to count the vote of a State even if it was informally presented and informal in all that is connected with it, rather than to deny the right of a State to vote whenever its certificate was formal.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose this case: Suppose that a certificate is sent here by usurping electors, and the Congress of the United States should have cognizance of that fact. In that case under this bill one branch of Congress could compel the count of the certificate of usurping electors.

Mr. LOGAN. Both branches of Congress would be required to exclude it; but if there was no certificate except that, how would you have any knowledge of any other? Will the Senator answer me that question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I might have knowledge of the fact outside.

Mr. LOGAN. But that is not the point, and as a lawyer you know it is not. How would you have any official knowledge of it? You would have none, and you know it as a lawyer,

Mr. MERRIMON. I could ascertain it in this way, and I think it is perfectly logical and lawyer-like: The joint assemblage of Congress would have the power to direct a committee to inquire into those facts just like this body might appoint a committee to inquire into facts, and when they should be ascertained, the joint assemblage of Congress could act upon the facts as they might be reported.

Mr. LOGAN. Where does the Senator get the authority to appoint his committee? When the Constitution says that the Senate shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives and there the votes shall be opened by the Vice-President and there they shall be counted and the result declared, where does the Senator get his authority for this committee?

Mr. MERRIMON. From the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot find it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I say the Constitution provides that Congress shall act in a joint capacity; and Congress in that joint capacity has the power to determine all questions that are essential to ascertain the result of the electoral vote, to appoint committees, or do anything else for that purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I will not go into a labyrinth of argument on that point, because it is not the question before us now. I only say to the Senator that I do not recognize his law, but I will not detain the Senate by any argument in reference to it. I merely say of the objections made now, so far as the Senator from North Carolina is concerned I think he is a fair man usually, but I do not believe that we could frame a bill to-night or at any other time in reference to counting the vote of President and Vice-President that he would assent to, unless he framed it himself.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sorry the Senator has such a bad opinion of me.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a bad opinion at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think I have given any evidence of that. I am sure Congress has power to pass a bill, and I would most cheerfully support a bill for this purpose which I believe conformed to the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give the Senator the reason why I made the statement. He has argued this constitutional question to-day differently from any man I ever heard argue it in my life, and therefore I presumed he would have to draw a bill himself in order to get his vote for it. I have seen it the case frequently that legislators never could frame laws that would suit other people. It is not to be expected that they can. All laws are compromises; in their nature they must be, because our minds are so constituted that they do not run exactly in the same channel.

I was surprised, I must confess, at finding objections to this bill from some of the quarters from which they have come to-day, for it was different from my understanding in reference to it. But the objections that have been made to this bill by Senators to-night are objections that can be wiped away like a cobweb or as you would wipe water from a table with a sponge, by the logic of the Constitution and the fairness and the justice of the thing itself.

You have now a rule in your Manual allowing one House to reject the vote of a State. Do you say it is on account of fraudulent elections? They need not be fraudulent. If either House were to so far forget their honesty and integrity as to object to the vote of a State, they can prevent the vote being counted, whether it is an honest vote or a dishonest one. There is no objection specified in the joint rule; but it allows the objection of one House to prevent the counting of the vote of your State, my State, or any other State. I witnessed an exhibition of the workings of this joint rule two years ago. The vote of Arkansas was objected to in the House. That objection caused the Senate to retire and examine it. What was the objection? That the seal of the State was not affixed to the certificate of the men who cast the vote. It turned out that Arkansas had no seal of State; that the only seal she had was the seal of the secretary of state; and the certificate was stamped with that seal. Upon that frivolous objection the State of Arkansas was refused to be counted in the last presidential election. It only showed that any objection made, however frivolous, by one House might deprive a man who has been elected President of the United States of his right to the office, or might deprive a State or States of their right to vote. When, after seeing the operation of the rule in the direction in which this rule has operated, we change it even by law so as to require the action of both Houses, in my judgment it is just, in my judgment it is constitutional, in my judgment it is honest, in my judgment it is fair.

Mr. HAGER. I have no desire to enter extensively upon this debate, but rather to explain the vote that I shall give. It is a question of constitutional power and of constitutional interpretation that addresses itself to us as lawyers and as Senators. The view that I take is that the Constitution of itself is operative and that you cannot add to the powers conferred or diminish them. According to my view neither the twenty-second joint rule nor this bill, if it shall become a law, has any binding force upon the Congress that must act in this matter under the Constitution. In other words, we cannot here establish a rule by which we dictate to another Congress how they shall perform a constitutional duty. The Constitution is plain:

> The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

There is a plain duty imposed upon the President of the Senate and upon the Senate and House of Representatives assembled together. Can you say, sir, that you may limit your powers or add to them by any legislation here? Can you bind your successors in any matter of constitutional legislation? Turn to the powers that Congress has. Congress may "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." You might just as well undertake to pass a law here pointing out how Congress shall levy taxes and imposts, as to undertake to regulate them in the performance of a constitutional duty in regard to this matter. As well might one Supreme Court undertake to bind their successors as for one Congress to undertake to bind their successors. It cannot be done either by legislation or by any rule that you may see fit to adopt.

I admit that there is an imperfection in this part of the Constitution as to how the joint body when assembled together shall proceed to act and determine the result of the election. But as the duty is imposed upon the Senate and the House of Representatives it is for them and each body that is called upon to act in that capacity to regulate rules for themselves.

There is another important matter that enters into this consideration upon that point, and I should like to hear Senators answer it. If we pass this bill, in order that it may become a law it must be signed by the President. The President then to some extent enters into the counting of the electoral vote. Suppose we pass this bill and it becomes a law by the signature of the President with the intent to bind some other House, not ourselves. I admit we could pass a law here to regulate the election if we were to act in the matter. If we were to meet next week to count the electoral vote we could by the concurrence of both Houses pass a law to regulate our action in the matter; but we cannot, I say, pass a law to regulate the action of a future House or future Senate when they meet to perform a constitutional duty.

But, as I said, suppose this bill becomes a law signed by the President, how are you to get rid of it in the future? If it is binding upon the Senate and House that meet next, it requires, in order to repeal it, not only the vote of the Senate and the House, but the approval of the President. Thus the President enters into the consideration, when the Constitution never contemplated any such thing. It is a duty imposed entirely upon the Senate and House of Representatives; and if you pass this bill, in order that it may be a law it requires the approval of the President, and hereafter to repeal it and get rid of it also requires the approval of the President, so that a future Senate and a future House of Representatives may be entirely under the control of the President of the United States.

Did the framers of the Constitution contemplate any such state of things as that when the twelfth article of amendment was adopted? It was the intent that the people should control the election of the President, and not the President of the United States. It was the intent that the electoral vote should be brought here and opened in the presence of both Houses, and that they there, according to such rules as they might adopt, should declare the result. The President has nothing to do with it.

Sir, I am satisfied that we cannot bind our successors by any legislation in regard to a constitutional duty that they have to perform. They themselves must judge how they shall perform it; and you might as well undertake to dictate that they should do it in a particular way to accomplish a particular result as to undertake to say that they shall do it according to the provisions of this bill.

I shall therefore vote against the measure. I believe that if it passes it will be clearly unconstitutional. I see also that there is great difficulty in getting the question before any tribunal by which it may be determined. I think we should legislate on a matter of this importance with great deliberation and great care, because I know of no tribunal that can undertake to decide the question. It cannot be raised until a convention meets to act upon it; and they must act within a certain period of time, and it may lead to interminable difficulties before we can get a judicial interpretation of this law as to whether it be or be not a constitutional act.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] failed to remove the objections in my mind. From his remarks I do not think he understood my objections.

The first section of the bill is a very smooth, easy-going section. If both Houses concur in the counting it goes on to say that the vote shall be counted and the result declared. But when you come to the second section, where there are two sets of returns, which may happen and probably would happen, and if persons were sufficiently disposed to have a revolution it would be a natural state to have two sets of returns. What then? "That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate" * * * "that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide." They shall decide which of the two returns shall be counted. My friend from Illinois thinks it is eminently fair to leave the two Houses to decide separately such a question. If the two Houses agree affirmatively that a particular return shall be counted, then very well; but suppose they do not.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator a question right there. Suppose there are two returns placed in the hands of the Vice-President, who shall determine which one of them shall be counted? Will you leave it to him to determine it? Will you leave it to one House to determine? Or will you leave it to both Houses to determine it? Somebody must determine, and to whom will you leave it?

Mr. STEWART. I will discuss that afterward. I would leave it where it could be determined, and not put it where it certainly cannot be determined as this bill does.

Mr. MORTON. That does not answer the question.

Mr. STEWART. I will answer it by and by. I say I would put it somewhere where it could be determined, but this bill has put it where it cannot be determined. Provided the two Houses disagree, there is no determination of the question but civil war, because you have provided in the same bill that the result shall not be declared until all the votes are counted, and they cannot be counted on a disagreement.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared.

The votes shall not be counted unless both Houses agree when there are two sets of returns, and unless all the votes are counted the joint meeting shall not dissolve nor shall the result be declared! There you are. Suppose you had a heated discussion for a week or ten days, the two Houses refuse to agree and there is no way of declaring the result, and there is nothing pointed out as to what is to be done next, and in that state of things it seems to me you have legislated yourselves into war.

I am not here to defend the twenty-second joint rule. I have seen the operation of it, and I think it very dangerous, and believe that both Houses will consent at this session or any other to get rid of that. Under that it is in the power of either House to exclude the vote of a State; but that being done, which is a great injustice, it does not further provide that the result shall not be declared or the joint meeting dissolved. It does not leave you in a state of anarchy. Under it a great outrage might be committed by the action of either House excluding States entitled to cast their votes; but there is no prohibition against declaring the result and having a President so that we can have law and order. I think this bill is a good deal worse than the twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. MORTON. What is the provision the Senator refers to?

Mr. STEWART. "Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared."

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator know that it provides, as the twenty-second rule does, for taking a recess?

Mr. STEWART. It does provide for taking plenty of recesses. I understand that and that is one trouble. It provides for recesses, for time, for deliberation, for discussion, for organization, for treason, and for overthrowing the Government; but it does not provide for declaring anybody President. You have your recess and you get apart and the two Houses disagree and nobody has authority under this bill to come together and declare the result; no result is declared, and we have no President. Every day faction will be strengthening if the two Houses should disagree and no chance of a result. Under the twenty-second joint rule they might arbitrarily rule out a State, but when they came together they would be bound to declare a result.

Mr. MORTON. The terms are the same precisely in the first section as in the rule on that point.

Mr. STEWART. In the first section it is provided that they shall declare the result when the votes are counted, but in the second section there is a contingency in which the votes cannot be counted. You say if the two Houses do not agree the vote shall not be counted, and then you say in the last section the result shall not be declared unless all the votes are counted.

Mr. MORTON. There is no such provision there that the result shall not be declared.

Mr. STEWART. I will read it again:

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared.

Mr. MORTON. Exactly.

Mr. STEWART. You cannot declare the result until you count all the votes, and you have provided a contingency in which all the votes shall not be counted. You say that where there are duplicate returns and the two Houses disagree the vote shall not be counted at all. Then you say that the joint meeting shall not be dissolved until they are counted. I think we had better leave it under the Constitution. I think that is better than to have this legislation on the subject.

The President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

And for a great number of years they were counted.

Mr. LOGAN. What votes does it mean?

Mr. STEWART. It means the votes that are there.

Mr. LOGAN. Does it mean all the votes or part of the votes?

Mr. STEWART. It does not provide affirmatively for anarchy, and I would rather leave it to the good sense and patriotism of the two Houses there together to work out a good result and in the hands of a firm Vice-President to declare some result and keep us out of anarchy; I would rather the Vice-President would take it by the strong hand and declare the result and give us a President, than trust to a law that legislates us into anarchy. It is not clear to me but that the Vice-President after he has counted the votes and found a majority would have a right to declare the result; he would have a show of authority; and somebody would be President. I would rather leave it just where the Constitution leaves it, and when a result is reached let the Vice-President declare that somebody is President. I think there is less danger in that than in providing for all sorts of frivolous objections and then providing one contingency when anarchy is inevitable.

I am aware of the good faith of the author of this bill; I am aware of the labor bestowed on this bill; but I am also aware of the intrinsic difficulty of the case. It is all idle to talk about getting up any other tribunal. I do not believe your courts would last an hour after they had this function to perform. It is too big a function to turn over to any other tribunal than Congress. It is too great a question for any tribunal to be organized to decide. No tribunal could exist a day in this Republic that was organized to try this question, and the more you legislate to patch this up the worse you will be off in my opinion. The founders of the Republic would have used some language and pointed out some ways of doing this thing if it had seemed safe, but they said that when the two Houses were assembled the votes should be counted and the result declared.

I think the sensible thing is to repeal the twenty-second joint rule. I do not believe this bill will be passed when it is reflected upon. I do not believe it is wise to pass it. I want to say here that I believe more evil results will grow out of this than out of the present rule. This bill provides for a great many contingencies—provides for one of the worst features of the rule, frequent separations, giving opportunity for arrangements and organizations; and those who have seen such things know the evil results of them and the danger of a disagreement between the two Houses, when the disagreement must bring them right against a position where there is no law to execute itself and where it is easy for a party to say, "We will not go any further; we will not count any votes." Again:

And that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and lawful return.

But suppose the two Houses do not agree, then that return cannot be counted. They must agree affirmatively before it can be counted. Then I submit that there is a disagreement upon a vital point.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared.

Suppose you have a division of opinion as to a vote; suppose now that from the State of Illinois there come up two sets of returns; the two Houses separate. One House decides in favor of one set of returns and the other House upon the other. They meet; that vote cannot be counted. If there is only one return it cannot be excluded without the joint action of the two Houses.

Mr. LOGAN. But one return now can be excluded by one House.

Mr. STEWART. It is not excluded, but you do not count it. Here it says the votes shall all be counted. If it is excluded from the count, then the joint meeting shall not dissolve; it is hung up. There may be various pretexts under this bill to get the two Houses separated and discuss the question of who shall be President, and after heated discussion two or three weeks you will find you have a great deal more difficulty than there would be if you declared the result at once before there could be organizations. This invites them. I do not want any rules except those that have stood since the foundation of the Government. The twenty-second joint rule has nearly destroyed us already. All see the folly of that practice. Let the Vice-President declare the result. That is the safest thing that can be done in my opinion.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the Clerk to report the second section. It seems to me that it is inconsistent with other parts of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall each decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. EATON. Now, I desire to suggest that the first section of the bill provides—

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to the body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State, to the counting of which objections have been made, shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

Now the second section is that—

All such returns shall be opened by him [the Vice-President] in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall each decide to be the true and valid return.

I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if there may not be some inconsistency here? It strikes me that there may be. Let me suppose that the condition of the country just after the next presidential election should be as it is now and has been for years past, though I hope it will not be. A certain return comes up; the seal of the State is upon that return, or a pretended seal of the State, whether stolen or not; it is there. How do you reconcile these two provisions? I take it that men are generally made of the same material. I apprehend that if a return came here that I believed was a fraud, that I had no doubt the seal of the State was fraudulently placed upon, I would vote against the reception of that return, and my friend from Indiana would in the same way vote against the other return, and for some good reason. Our feelings of party might have something to do with our judgment, but we would both endeavor to be honest; I have no doubt about that; but as men think differently to-day with regard to the government in Louisiana, one gentleman honestly thinking it to be a fraud and usurpation and another gentleman of equal capacity, of equal honesty, of equal integrity, believing it to be a proper and legitimate government. I suggest that if the condition of the country two years hence should be just what it is to-day, this bill would produce anarchy in this city and you could not carry it out. By honest men I mean men doing what they believe to be just and right, but differing in opinion with regard to the returns that are sent here. I say there is an inconsistency between these two sections, and gentlemen had better be very careful before they pass the bill.

Mr. MORTON. One word in answer to the Senator from Connecticut. The second section is intended to apply to a particular case which has occurred in one of the States of this Union, that is, to a case where there are two sets of returns from the same State sent to the Vice-President. There are two sets of returns in his hands. Somebody must have the power to determine which are the correct returns. Will you give that power to the Vice-President, will you trust it to him alone? Will you give it to one of the Houses independent of the other? You answer "no." Then you give it to both Houses to determine which of the two sets of returns is the correct return. You cannot do anything else under these circumstances. If somebody cannot determine that question, it is not to be determined at all and neither set is to be counted. You would not leave that to the Vice-President, who might be a candidate himself. You would not perhaps trust his judgment. It might be a disputed point. You would not leave it to one House. Therefore you leave it just where you leave the enactment of a law—you leave it to both Houses.

The first section refers to a case where there is only one return from a State. Somebody gets up and makes an objection; it may be a very trivial one. We have known examples of that kind. Now the twenty-second joint rule says that unless both Houses concur in overruling that objection the vote is lost. We say that is not sensible; no State ought to be disfranchised in that way. We say in this bill that unless both Houses agree that the objection is a good one the vote of the State shall be counted.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. The inconsistency here is only because these provisions are in two different sections. The first section lays down a general rule; the second section excepts one class of cases from that general rule. If the words "section 2" were stricken out, and the words "provided that" inserted, so as to make the second section precisely what it is, a proviso to the first section, there would be no inconsistency at all. It is the office of a proviso in a statute, as everybody knows, to except some case from the generality of the text of the law. This second section is in fact a proviso. It excepts one class of cases from the operation of the general rule established by the text of the statute.

I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he can avoid all the trouble on the score of apparent inconsistency by simply amending the bill by striking out the words "section 2," and inserting "provided that."

Mr. MORTON. The bill is not amendable now. At this stage of proceeding I prefer not to amend the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are now on the passage, though nobody would object if the Senator from Indiana wishes to make that amendment.

Mr. MORTON. It is not an amendment of substance, and I ask to have the vote taken.

Mr. GORDON. I do not want to discuss the bill; I only want to ask the Senator a question that I think is of some importance. If I understand the operation of this bill, if it becomes a law it can increase the electoral vote of States, and may therefore make more votes in the electoral college than the Constitution provides for. Now let us see if that be true. The second section of the bill provides that where there is more than one return from a State both shall be opened; that is, "such returns shall be opened by the Vice-President in the presence of the two Houses." Then the first section provides that neither shall be rejected unless upon the concurrence of both Houses. Now, suppose one be a democratic return and one a republican return, and the Senate in good faith believes that the republican return is the true and valid return, in the language of the second section, and the democratic House believes that the democratic return is the true and valid return, then under the second section of this bill both of these returns must be counted, giving to the electoral college an additional number of votes.

Mr. LOGAN. O, no.

Mr. MORTON. I submit to my friend from Georgia that it is not so.

Mr. GORDON. That occurs to me as the working of the bill, and I want to know whether it is so.

Mr. MORTON. The second section is intended to apply to a case where there are double returns from the same State. In that case somebody has got to decide. We say it shall be left to both Houses. It shall not be left to the President of the Senate to decide a grave question of that kind. It should not be left to one House alone. It should be left to both Houses, and that return—not returns, but that return which the two Houses agree is the valid one shall be counted.

Mr. GORDON. I understand that.

Mr. MORTON. Does my friend think it would be safer if we were to say that only one return should be counted from one State?

Mr. GORDON. Suppose both Houses would not agree upon any one of these returns. My question was based upon the supposition that the Senate should declare one to be the valid return and the House the other the valid return. Now I maintain that under the first section of the bill both must be counted, because neither can be thrown out unless both Houses agree.

Mr. MORTON. My friend has not read the section. The section applying to two returns goes on to say:

And that return only from such State.

The word "only" was put in some time ago, on the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. GORDON. I had not seen the word "only."

Mr. MORTON. "And that return only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, each acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return."

Mr. GORDON. But suppose they disagree? That is the point.

Mr. MORTON. Then neither is counted. That is the express provision.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I cannot at this last moment see the vote taken on this bill with a debate going on among gentlemen so distinguished, which seems to me so entirely away from the real point of issue in reference to the bill, without saying a final word.

When the Senator from Indiana replied to the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut by asking "Where shall we leave the power?" he showed precisely the throes and anxieties of his mind as to where that power should be left. If he was willing to leave that power where the Constitution of his country places it, he would have no anxiety to decide where he should leave it. He can put it nowhere. All he should do with it is to leave it where it was put by the fathers of the country until he can succeed in altering the Constitution which is the fundamental law of the land.

But, Mr. President, the few words I am going to utter were called forth more by a remark made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] and some subsequent remarks that were made by the Senator from California, [Mr. HAGER.] I endeavored, feebly indeed, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while it was very doubtful whether the twenty-second joint rule was constitutional and very doubtful whether a joint rule passed by these two bodies in separate session could control that joint meeting for another purpose under a constitutional power, yet a bill, which is an act of legislation, attempting to control that, was clearly unconstitutional. But, sir, reaching for a substance I lost sight of an illustration which I got from the Senator from Rhode Island; and in my own behalf and on behalf of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] I desire to thank the Senator from Rhode Island for having introduced that point. An act of legislation, this bill requires the signature of the President of the United States. The President of the United States can veto this bill. The President of the United States may be a candidate running for a second or third term, and it may be important to him to settle how these votes shall be counted; and whether he approves of the bill or not finally settles the question. You can make no such law without his approval. Does any gentleman dare rise in his seat and say that the Constitution of the United States has placed it in the power of the President of the United States to say how these votes shall be counted? Make your rule here; let it be decided in joint session or in separate session, each House by itself; do by rule all that is necessary to execute that power which the Constitution of the United States gives you for the purpose of counting the votes; do all that; but dare you say that, without one clause in the Constitution to justify it, the very man who may be a candidate may have the power of approving or disapproving a bill, vetoing or not vetoing a bill preventing the action to be had two years hence in the counting of the votes by the two bodies or by the Vice-President in their presence?

I thank the Senator from California for his illustration and I thank the Senator from Rhode Island for making that point. As I said before, I was grasping at it when I said that no legislative act could control that body; it was not an act of legislation, it was not a law; but for the moment it did not occur to me that it requires the President as well as both Houses of Congress to make a law; and in passing this bill you are proposing to-night to regulate, contrary to the Constitution, the counting of these votes by making the President a power that may veto the rules you make. Gentlemen here discuss whether this thing shall be done in joint session or in separate session, whether it shall reqnire both Houses; but the President of the United States has his voice in that by your bill. He can send you word that he will approve no bill which puts the thing in this position or that position. He vetoes it. Then you try to pass it by a two-thirds vote over his veto.

The truth is and the honest truth is that the twenty-second joint rule ought never to have been passed. The whole power rested in the joint assembly when it met; and as the Senator from Nevada well said—I cannot quote his words—the power in those simple few words is as plain and express as language can make it, and as the Senator from Connecticut said this afternoon, for seventy-five years we got along very well; there never was any trouble, and I believe that there never will be any trouble in counting the vote unless you undertake to take the power from the place where the Constitution put it.

This is an effort on your part by an act of legislation to change the body, to control it; and do you say to me this is only the manner of the choice? If that be so, the Constitution left the manner of the choice, by not expressing it, to the body where it placed the power of counting the vote. The counting of the vote was put on the body who were told they must count the vote. If it be a manner, if, as I said before, you insist that the manner may be determined by your joint rules and joint regulations made in separate bodies, no man can insist that the President of the United States has anything to do with the manner. Has the President of the United States anything to do with how your tellers are appointed? Do you recollect a little amendment offered this morning by the Senator from Ohio, that there should be two tellers on the part of the Senate? Has the President of the United States anything to do with that? Did the Constitution mean he should have anything to do with it? The President of the United States, if this be proper, had better be there present personally to attend, and instead of the clause of the Constitution being that the Vice-President shall open the votes in the presence of the two Houses, change your law and say the President himself shall be personally present.

I use these illustrations as they occur to me simply in order that before the vote is taken on this bill the point made by my distinguished friend from Rhode Island should not be forgotten or omitted. It is precisely the point, as I said before, that I was trying to reach this morning, and I thank him heartily for having brought it out.

In addition to that my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] suggests to me that the instant the law is passed it becomes the duty of the President on his oath to execute it; and here the man who may be a candidate running has the power of veto in his hand, and is made a party to the making of the very rule of this joint body, and he is the man in command of the Army and Navy sworn on his oath to execute it.

Sir, I say to the Senate with perfect frankness and with perfect candor that I did not know this bill was so bad when I first spoke upon it. I sat here this afternoon a listener. My mind went step by step during the debate, and I found that the bill in my judgment was unconstitutional; and listening to-night to the points that have been made, I say it is much worse than unconstitutional; it is a revolutionary measure, and I do not believe the bill has had proper consideration. I believe that views will enter the minds of gentlemen who have charge of this bill before this debate is over which will make them in their own hearts think differently about it.

I have found in my humble experience in life, not only at the bar, not only in the Senate, not only in deliberative bodies, but at business meetings of all kinds, that there was nothing which would elicit truth so well as the knocking of heads and minds together. The advantage of our free debate in this body, which God forbid ever shall be restricted, is for those of us who come here, as I hope we all do, really and honestly wishing and hoping to do our duty and to vote on bills as our best judgment may guide us. The advantage is that we learn; and although we may not be so well prepared when the debate opens as others, particularly those on the committee and the lawyers of the Senate, yet with reasonable good sense after hearing the arguments we have the advantage of a judge who hears a case argued on both sides. I hope if there are gentlemen in the Senate whose minds have become awakened by this debate to the fact that this question is a much more serious constitutional question and likely to create more trouble than they apprehended, they will pause before they put this bill through to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think Senators have borrowed a great deal of trouble about this matter. I am not acute enough to see the weight of many objections made to this bill. Look at it: the first, second, third, and fourth sections of this bill differ from the twenty-second joint rule only in one or two important particulars. The twenty-second joint rule has this provision:

> And no question shall be decided affirmatively and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses.

On the other hand, this bill provides:

> And no electoral vote or votes from any State, to the counting of which objections have been made, shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

There is the gist of the whole matter. The other point of difference between the rule and the bill is this: The rule requires that when the two Houses meet to pass upon a question raised in joint convention, the question shall be decided without debate. The third section of this bill, however, provides for a limited debate.

These are the material differences between the first, second, third, and fourth sections of the bill and the present joint rule. My objection to this bill, if I was going to make it as a reason for voting against it, would be that it is unnecessary, in order to correct the errors in the joint rule, to pass a law; and the only exception that I take to this measure is that it is in the form of a bill instead of a joint rule. It is to be sent now to the President and approved or disapproved by him. It will be very much like the thirteenth amendment, which was sent to Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln said he did not see that his signature to it would give it any additional force, but still he was very glad to sign the thirteenth amendment. If this bill is sent to the President of the United States, I believe it will be a useless act. It will have all the force of a joint rule, binding upon each House in the ministerial duty of counting the presidential vote, without the signature of the President; but the signature of the President will not make it any the worse, will not take away its binding force, will not change it. It is said the President may veto it. If he vetoes it, there is the end of it; but what is the use of talking about that? There is no difficulty of that sort.

Therefore so far as the gist of the matter is concerned the first, third, and fourth sections of the bill are only a modification of the rule, and we have been spending this whole day in doing what might be done in that way. But as the bill has been presented and the Senator from Indiana with a good deal of force said Senators objected to any form of joint rule, and my colleague I am told concurred in that opinion that it was better to give this change of the rule the form of a law; if in order to satisfy some of our democratic friends it was deemed advisable to put this in the form of a law, it cannot hurt it by that form, it cannot make it any worse and does not make it any better. The signature of the President is not necessary at all to the modification of our rules, but his signature will not hurt. I believe we refused to send the fourteenth amendment to President Johnson because he had nothing to do with it, but we sent the thirteenth amendment to President Lincoln and I believe we sent the fifteenth amendment to President Grant. I am not certain about that, and it is not material.

The only new matter introduced in this bill is in the second section, which provides for the case of a contested election where there are two sets of electors claiming to be electors from a given State. This provides for a case that is not provided for by the joint rule, and it is a case that it is well enough to provide for and I see no objection on that point. It provides that where there are two returns found in their character from a State or from two bodies to be electors, if the two Houses cannot agree which is the proper legitimate return, for that reason the vote shall not be counted. That is all there is of it.

I do not think there is any very great evil to occur from the passage of this bill, excepting that it provides by bill against a contingency, a trouble arising in the mere execution of a ministerial act if the two Houses concur. I regard it as vitally important, because it is utterly impossible in the nature of things to decide a contest which may arise in the count of electoral votes under the present rule. I shall vote for the bill, not that it is in the best form, because I would prefer some modification of the joint rule, but it is in substance an improvement of the joint rule and in two important particulars it is a vital improvement. That is, it prevents either House by its own arbitrary dictum from excluding the vote of a State from being counted, and next it allows a reasonable debate.

We all remember the difficulty about Arkansas growing out of the fact that not one word could be said. The objection was made and presented to us, and there was not a single word of debate allowed, under the joint rule, and every Senator went up to the Clerk's desk to pass upon the question whether or not the seal of the secretary of state was attached to the return from Arkansas or the seal of the State. We had no opportunity to explain. Somebody endeavored to say that the State of Arkansas had no seal, but he was hooted down, as I remember, or at least was not allowed to say anything in the way of debate. This bill allows a moderate and reasonable debate, and in that respect it is an improvement on the joint rule. The only material changes are, first, that it allows a short and reasonable debate, and next it changes the rule as to the effect of a disagreement of the two Houses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that this bill will have the force of a law without the signature of the President?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I say it could have the force of a joint rule without the signature of the President, and as a joint rule it would be just as effective.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But not in the shape it is now.

Mr. SHERMAN. No. The President of the United States will probably not veto it, and the only danger my friend seeks to guard against is that possibly the President will veto it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood the Senator to say that it would have force without being submitted to the President for his signature. That certainly cannot be.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not in the form of a bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The true answer to the suggestion which was made by the Senator from California and repeated by the Senator from New Jersey, my colleague, is that the Constitution provides that Congress may by proper legislation carry out and execute the various provisions of the Constitution. This is doing that.

Mr. SHERMAN. This provision of the Constitution is to be exe cuted by two bodies of men acting in a ministerial capacity witnessing the counting of the vote, and we can prescribe the rules and mode and manner of doing that business just as we can the mode of coming to an agreement about disagreeing votes on amendments.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to ask one question, and that is whether when we get through with this bill it will be considered a rule or an enactment without the approbation of the President? Ordinarily legislative bodies control their own rules, but in this case we put it beyond our control.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HAGER. Certainly; unless the President approves the bill we may pass to repeal this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I have no doubt the two Houses can in their own way, in their own manner, on the very day they meet in convention, pass a joint rule prescribing the mode and manner of doing that ministerial duty.

Mr. CONKLING. And thus repeal a law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt. This amounts to a modification of the joint rule, just as the two Houses of Congress by a vote of two-thirds can submit a constitutional amendment to the people of the United States whether the President be willing or unwilling.

Mr. CONKLING. But does my honorable friend mean that if we pass a bill in the form of a statute, which becomes a statute by the executive signature and takes its place in the book, we can supersede or repeal that statute in any way except by passing another statute?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do say that in regard to this ministerial duty to be performed by the two Houses that the two Houses at the next Congress can pass a modification of the rule which will abolish and repeal this statute.

Mr. HAGER. Without the President's approval?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I undertake to say as a lawyer that that is a cognovit and admission, clear and distinct, that there is no constitutional power to pass this bill. If there is constitutional power to pass this bill, it becomes a statute, and no joint rule, no concurrent resolution can strike it down. The Constitution says that, and such an attempt would be in the very teeth of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is any ground for that declaration whatever. The Constitution of the United States declares that the two Houses may meet together in joint convention and count the votes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does practically, and we have a right to prescribe by our joint rules our own actions. We may put this joint rule in the form of an act, and yet the two Houses, in the execution of that ministerial duty, may adopt any other rule they may see proper. Sir, if we put our joint rule, the whole of it, in the form of law, the Constitution gives to each House the power to make rules for its own government and the power to make joint rules for the government of the two Houses. That is a constitutional power, and this Forty-third Congress cannot deprive the next Congress of the power of making rules for the government of the two Houses or for the government of either House. There the constitutional privilege overrides all your laws.

Sir, the Senate of the United States can make any rule it pleases that affects its mode of proceeding, and no law can affect it, and the next Senate may change it. So with the House of Representatives. The right to make the rules of each legislative body is inherent in every parliamentary body, and is expressly guaranteed to it by the Constitution of the United States; and the right to make joint rules is equally operative.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does the Senator find that power in the Constitution?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can look at the Constitution and find that each House may prescribe its own rules.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I see; but the Senator adds that they have the right to make joint rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly, the one includes the other. The joint rules of the two Houses are nothing but the concurrent rules of the Senate and House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator say to this clause of the Constitution——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will not catechise me now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. I was merely asking a question for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. How is it that we pass a bill? Do we send a joint rule as to our mode of passing a bill to the President of the United States? Not at all. Where does our power exist to make a joint rule? I ask my honorable friend, and he may answer me after while. Is that given by the Constitution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator wish an answer now?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; after while. Well, I will ask the Senator to answer now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator now, but if the honorable Senator will state his question I will stand the catechism.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask where he finds the power of both Houses to make joint rules for their government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was asking the Senator that very question. When he answers my question I will answer his.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is as frank as I expected the honorable Senator to be. We do make these joint rules. If we make them without any authority in the Constitution, are they of any binding force upon us?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator pardon me if I ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I asked him in good faith to tell me whereabouts in the Constitution he found the power to enact a joint rule, and he turns around and asks me the same question, and when I ask him to answer me he says I am evading. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will answer the question of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish light about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has the Constitution before him. If he will turn to the provision that authorizes each House to make rules for its own government, I will answer him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will do that. It is in the second paragraph of the fifth section of the first article:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is under that clause that joint rules are made, because the joint rules are but concurring votes of the two Houses. We have joint rules that have been in existence from the very foundation of the Government. Where is the express provision of the Constitution which authorizes the two Houses to make joint rules? It necessarily flows out of the right of each House to make rules for its own government; and rules for the government of the two Houses may be made by joint vote. There the power rests. The two Houses acting together may go on a certain day named in the Constitution or law to count the vote, and they can make a joint rule to govern their proceeding. That has already been done. That is the constitutional right of the two Houses, and no law can impair it unless it can repeal the Constitution of the United States which gives to each House and the two Houses power to make these rules. This law cannot prevent this exercise of a constitutional power, and there is the answer to my honorable friend from New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are we, then, exercising a constitutional power in passing a law which repeals the constitutional privileges of each House under the clause that has been read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that it makes any difference whether we put our joint rules in the form of a law or in the form of rules. It does not weaken their force in the least. They are the assent of the two Houses. As I said before, if I had been consulted or if I had undertaken to frame this matter myself, I would have made it simply an amendment to the joint rules, and so suggested to the honorable Senator from Indiana; but he said that there were other Senators——

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Vermont among others suggested that it had better be in the form of a law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; and I stand by that now.

Mr. MORTON. There being two opinions, I rather thought myself it had better be in the form of a law, and accordingly took that course.

Mr. SHERMAN. My honorable colleague and the honorable Senator from Vermont concurred that this had better be in the form of a law. Why? Is it anything but a joint rule? Is it anything but an agreement between the two Houses as to how they shall perform this duty? Their advice was followed, and if the Senator from Indiana has got into trouble, it has been by following their advice. I say that the next Senate and the next House can, if they choose, modify and change this law, if you call it so, though it is nothing but a joint rule. It has not the binding force of a law except as it is the concurrent sense of the two Houses, and may be put in the form of a law. The President's signing it does not weaken it, though it may be a work of supererogation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question? I do not wish to take the Senator's time or ask questions if it is disagreeable to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator in view of what he is saying what construction he puts on the third clause of the seventh section of the first article:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to that has been made a hundred times, that where an act is to be performed by the two bodies, or is to regulate proceedings of the two bodies in the making of laws, or in any duty whatever, it does not require the assent of the President. It is only when you wish to give something more than a mere concurring vote of the two Houses the force of law to bind the people of the United States outside of Congress that the forms of law are required; but to govern the proceedings of the two Houses, acting together or separately, joint rules are amply sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER.) The question is, Shall the bill pass? on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. NORWOOD, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea" if present.

The roll-call having been concluded, resulted—yeas 28, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Washburn, West, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Carpenter, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hager, Jones, Kelly, Merrimon, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, and Windom—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, and Wadleigh—25.

So the bill was passed.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill is now taken up and in Committee of the Whole and ready to be read. I have this proposition to make to gentlemen on the other side: that we will adjourn whenever it now suits their convenience, after the matters upon the table are cleared off, and that general debate shall terminate on this bill on Saturday next at two o'clock in the afternoon; any amendments proposed are to be disposed of on a five-minutes debate on each side; then thirty minutes to be allowed to the Senator in charge to close the debate, and then the bill to be finally disposed of without further debate; no other measure to be interposed outside of the morning hour while this bill is under consideration. I ask unanimous consent that there may be an understanding of this character.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if in his proposition he means that the five-minutes debate on amendments shall continue after two o'clock on Saturday?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If amendments shall be offered.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not allow amendments to be offered during the time between now and then?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Any amendment may be offered, but it might happen that there would be no opportunity before.

Mr. LOGAN. By a five-minutes debate on amendments we might be kept here a week.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is any danger of that.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not like that at all.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear the proposition read again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The proposition that I make and ask unanimous consent for is that the general debate shall terminate on this bill on Saturday next at two o'clock in the afternoon; that any amendments proposed are to be disposed of on five minutes' debate on each side—of course by that I mean amendments moved in good faith, where men talk to the point, no filibustering or amendments of that character; then thirty minutes to close the debate, then the bill to be finally disposed of; and meantime, after the morning hour each day, that the bill shall not be laid aside or pushed out by taking up other measures.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does that contemplate that Saturday shall be occupied in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Until two o'clock and the necessary time afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. On Saturday I had hoped to bring up for consideration the tax bill. I do not wish to interfere with the civil-rights bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It only takes two hours on Saturday.

Mr. LOGAN. But if amendments are offered it may take the rest of the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So they may; and I make this proposition knowing perfectly well that the gentlemen on the other side, those who are opposed to this bill, (to say nothing of those who may have something to say in its favor,) have it in their power, without being accused of a design to frustrate the fair wishes of the majority, to talk much longer than from now at quarter of nine o'clock at night, during the sitting of to-morrow from twelve o'clock to such time as we might sit, and then two hours in the next day. Therefore, Mr. President, I make this as a fair and generous proposition, so as to satisfy all sides.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let us all agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to the proposition indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYARD. The statement is made by the honorable Senator that the debate upon this measure is to be left to those who oppose this measure to-night, if they please, and to-morrow during the session of the Senate, and that they are not to be cut off by the majority preventing debate upon this bill, so that a night session to-morrow night, lasting as long as the opposition may choose that it be prolonged, may be had on this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And with the understanding that no vote shall be taken.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And no other measure interposed.

Mr. MORTON. Do I understand that the other side are to have all the time for debate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am perfectly willing for one, and I should propose it, that as this bill has been so much discussed if gentlemen on the other side wish for all the time from to-morrow morning until Saturday at two o'clock to speak themselves, they shall have it. If that is not agreeable to other gentlemen they have only to say so.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the Senator will not undertake to bind the rest of us to that. Somebody else may want to say something.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent as indicated by him in regard to this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to say that I do not propose that all the time shall be given to the other side.

Mr. BAYARD. No; that was the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. I merely said that as we know there is a minority and a majority in this Chamber on this subject, the minority ought not to have their time of debate cut short by an adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I see no objection to.

Mr. BAYARD. We may have a day session, and a night session, and an all-night session to-morrow should our conscience lead us to debate the measure all night.

Mr. SARGENT. That is all right; but the majority should have some time to speak if they desire.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont, which has been repeated by him and taken down by the reporter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that after this bill is disposed of I shall call up the tax bill, even if it should be at a late hour on Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to that understanding. The Chair calls attention to the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont asking unanimous consent, as indicated by him, in regard to this bill which has been taken down by the reporter. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and unanimous consent is given.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT FOR 1874.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That ten thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1874 be printed; two thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and seventy-five hundred for the use of the institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move an executive session.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I move an adjournment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let us have an executive session for a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eight o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, the report of the inspector of national cemeteries for the year 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a Senate resolution of February 23, 1875, a report of the expedition to the Black Hills under command of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DESERT LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 4841) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAGER. I ask for the passage of that bill now. It has the approval of the Department and it has the approval of the Committee on Public Lands. I ask that it shall be passed. The object is to reclaim desert lands.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the bill will be first read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to consider the bill at the present time.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the unanimous consent for? Will the Chair state the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Senator from California asks that the bill from the House of Representatives for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California, be considered at this time. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be lawful for any citizen of the United States, or any person of requisite age who may be entitled to become a citizen and who has filed his declaration or intention to become such, to file a declaration with the register and the receiver of the proper land district for the county of Lassen, California, in which any desert land is situated, that he intends to reclaim a tract of desert land situated in that county not exceeding one section, by conducting water upon the same, so as to reclaim all of said land within the period of two years thereafter. The declaration shall be under oath, and shall describe particularly the section of land if surveyed, and if unsurveyed shall describe the same as nearly as possible without a survey; which declaration shall be supported by the affidavit of at least two credible witnesses, establishing to the satisfaction of the register or receiver the fact that the lands are of a character described. At any time within the period of two years after filing this declaration, and upon making satisfactory proof of the reclamation of the tract of land before the register and the receiver, such person shall be entitled to enter or locate the reclaimed section, or any part thereof, in the same manner as in cases where public lands of the United States are subject to entry, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, and shall receive a patent therefor. All lands within the county of Lassen, exclusive of timber lands and mineral lands, which do not produce grass or which will not without such reclamation produce some agricultural crop, are to be deemed desert lands.

Mr. SCOTT. That bill, as read, authorizes the location of land without a survey, which would interfere with the general system of locating Government lands, and I think it ought to be sent to the Committee on Public Lands before we act upon it.

Mr. HAGER. It has been, and the committee are in favor of it.

Mr. SCOTT. It has not been before the Committee on Public Lands of this body, although it may have been before the Committee on Public Lands of the House.

Mr. HAGER. The chairman of the committee [Mr. SPRAGUE] last night rose and moved to take up the bill with a view of passing it, but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said he would like it to lie over until this morning so that he might have an opportunity to examine it. It has the approval of the Committee on Public Lands. This is a House bill, and I call it up as the chairman of the committee is not here. The purpose is to make an attempt to reclaim the alkali lands. As we all know, on this side of the Sierra Nevada, they are not now worth the survey, and the Government will not pay for the survey. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] is on the Committee on Public Lands, and he can explain the bill to the Senate. As I have said, it has the approval of that committee. It is an experiment and these parties pay the Government price for the lands, but the Government will not survey the lands because they are not worth it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is consent granted? The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOTT. I rise now for a general purpose. I do not wish to object to any Senator's bill; but, as I am interested in having the committees called every morning, I wish to say that I shall object in advance to anything but the regular morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STEWART presented a resolution of the Legislature of Nevada, in favor of the restoration of the duty of ten cents per pound on boracic acid; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Nevada, instructing the Senators and Representatives from that State to modify the existing treaties with China so as to prevent the importation of Chinese, male and female, under servile contracts; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Nevada, in favor of changing the mail-route already established from Eureka, via Moray, Hot Creek, to Belmont, so as to include Sybo in said route and change the service from weekly to semi-weekly; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BAYARD. I present a memorial of E. & A. Betts; George W. Bush, president of the Wilmington Steamship Company; Pusey, Jones, & Co., builders of iron steamships; the Diamond State Iron Company; the Wilmington Board of Trade, and many other merchants and shippers interested in the commerce of Wilmington, Delaware, protesting against the abolition of the present Light-House Board. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented a memorial of citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee or any revival of internal taxes and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. tariff reduction of 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the aid of the national credit be extended to the completion of a great southern line of railroad to the Pacific; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MORTON presented three petitions of citizens of the counties of Warrick, Jefferson, and Warren, Indiana, soldiers in the late war, and others, praying for the enactment of a law for the equalization of bounties; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of a repeal of the tax of 10 per cent. on issues of State banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of an appropriation for the erection of two light-houses on Albemarle Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1102, to promote the efficiency of the light-house service of the United States, now before the Committee on Commerce, proposing and contemplating radical changes in the administration of the light-house service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a preamble and resolution, with accompanying letter, of a committee of a citizens' meeting held in Dubuque, Iowa, asking the completion of the Government building in that city and the purchase of additional ground contiguous thereto, as also the donation of certain land for a public park; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALCORN presented the memorial of James M. Lyles, of Newton County, Mississippi, praying for compensation for twelve bales of cotton taken from him by the United States after the close of the war of the rebellion, or that his claim for the same be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to be adjusted under the act of May 18, 1872, or that it be referred to the United States Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN it was Ordered, That Mrs. Anna Ella Carroll have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR BUCKINGHAM.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I desire to give notice to the Senate that to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock, if under the arrangement regarding the civil-rights bill I can then properly do so, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to introduce resolutions and make some remarks upon them commemorative of the life and services of my late colleague, Governor BUCKINGHAM, and if at three o'clock the state of business should not be such as to make it consistent, at four o'clock at the latest. I have conferred with the committees having the next business in charge in relation to this notice that I am now giving, and I give the notice in this way because, having been ill and unable to be present in the Chamber I have not been able to confer individually with Senators.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government, to report it without amendment. I will state that the committee on this bill are equally divided, but I am directed to report it, and I shall ask the consideration of it as soon as the civil-rights bill may be disposed of.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2763) granting a pension to Mrs. Sophia Green, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4757) granting a pension to Freemorton Young, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4772) granting a pension to Richard G. Mobley, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1304) to secure depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company from ultimate loss, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4434) giving certain authority to the accounting officers of the Treasury in the case of John L. Smith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) authorizing the acceptance by Captain C. H. Wells, of the United States Navy, of the cross of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1259) to authorize the appointment of Walton Cable as master in the Navy on the retired list, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1237) to amend section No. 3342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4833) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and remit certain taxes and penalties claimed to be due from mining and other corporations in the sixth collection district of Michigan, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Lanman, asking compensation for an alleged infringement of copyright, have instructed me to report it back. The petitioner has recently asked permission to withdraw his papers in the case. The committee do not see any objection to his doing that, but inasmuch as the claim is based upon an alleged infringement growing out of a publication made under an order of the Senate, which is the Congressional Directory, the Committee thought it worth while to place on file their opinion of the groundlessness of the claim, and therefore report that the claim is unfounded; but we recommend that he have leave to withdraw his papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1332) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1282) to change the place of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the district of Nevada, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 576) to provide for deductions from the terms of sentence of United States prisoners, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3504) to provide for deductions from the terms of sentence of United States prisoners, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the state of the law respecting the discharge from prisons of persons committed thereto by the courts of the United States, and into the expediency of providing for furnishing to such persons the means of temporary subsistence, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of D. F. Hayes, praying payment for certain cotton captured by the United States gun-boat Kittatinny near Velasco, Texas, on the 27th day of September, 1862, from the schooner Emma, bound for Kingston, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. The same committee, to which was referred a petition praying for the enactment of a law giving precedence in suits in the courts of the United States for alleged wrongs by seamen against any officer of any vessel, have directed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration. In making this report I wish to say that the committee do not intend to pass upon the merits of the supplication of this petition now, but there is no time to consider it, and that reason, among others, the committee make this report.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4816) to authorize the consolidation of the Auburn City National Bank and the First National Bank of Auburn, New York, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1096) amendatory of the act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas," reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1355) to amend an act fixing the rank of professors of mathematics in the United States Navy, approved May 31, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1356) to amend the acts of Congress in relation to agricultural colleges so as to extend the time in which the State of Florida may comply with the requirements of the said acts of Congress; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALCORN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1357) to provide for the appointment of an official stenographer in each of the district and circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate. When the Committee on Military Affairs was called after the agreement that each committee should have an hour, it was within fifteen minutes of the expiration of the time, and therefore I ask the consent of the Senate this morning to give me a few minutes in order to allow me to take up the bounty bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator give way to me for a moment to pass a bill which he knows all about, House bill No. 4727, to pay Mr. Wright for sweeping the streets? I do not think it will lead to any debate; I think the matter is understood by all.

Mr. LOGAN. I am in favor of that bill, and if the Senate will allow me to place the bounty bill before the Senate I can then dispose of the time for a few minutes perhaps. It is very desirable that the bill commonly known as the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers should be acted upon by the Senate at some time. I do not think it will take more than a few minutes to pass it. The bill is so shaped that Senators will understand it when they hear it read. It deducts the bounties that have been given by the States, so that it will reduce the amount of money to a very small sum. I do not think that if the Senate will hear the bill read there will be any objection to it on either side of the Chamber. I will not take up the time of the Senate if the bill comes up in any discussion unless discussion is provoked. Any questions that may be asked I will answer, and I think I can demonstrate to the Senate in five minutes that it is not a bill of the character which has been denominated, which will be so expensive to the Government. I should be glad to have the bill taken up and let the Senate vote on it; and if they vote it down, that will be the end of it. I will not trouble the Senate with a speech of any length. There are, you must remember, some two hundred or three hundred thousand soldiers in this country interested in this bill, and they have been asking for two or three years that we take action upon it, and I want the Senate to take action upon it, let it be what it may. I should be very glad if the Senate would let the bill be taken up and acted upon at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to my understanding it was distinctly agreed that the morning hour should be devoted to a particular committee after the formal morning business. Supposing the Committee on Finance in the second call would be reached to-day, I have been preparing and am prepared to offer business after the morning business is closed. The Committee on Military Affairs will probably be reached in the second call if we only stand by the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. I will stand by the rule, but I want to say to the Senator this: the Committee on Military Affairs has been passed over——

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we are coming to the second call now.

Mr. LOGAN. The hour that was allowed to the Military Committee was taken up by the business of another committee, and the Military Committee did not get its hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we have the second call of committees now.

Mr. LOGAN. If I was sure we could have the second call, that of course would make a difference. If the Senate will agree that this bill shall be considered at some time, it makes no difference to me when, before the adjournment—it will not take over an hour—I shall have no objection; but I do want it considered, at least a few minutes devoted to it at some time during this session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks consent to take up the bill named. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I must insist upon my right to the floor if the Committee on Finance is called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the introduction of bills is still in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no bill to introduce, but I wish merely to take up the bill to which I referred. If there are no other bills to be introduced I ask the Senate to indulge me in this.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. According to the order of the Senate the Chair must call the committees.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us keep on under the rule.

Mr. LEWIS. This will take but a few minutes, and it is simply an act of justice to a poor man. I hope the Senate will indulge me in this, as I have not been troublesome to the Senate heretofore and certainly will not be any trouble much longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have the right I will insist on following the order. I think the Committee on Finance can dispose of a dozen bills if it is called now.

Mr. LEWIS. Have I the right to move to suspend the business of a committee and take up this bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That question has been raised several times, and it seems to be the judgment of the Senate that a member has not the right; that the order is peremptory. The Chair will call on the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River as the committee next in order.

Mr. ALCORN. We have nothing to present this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is entitled to the remainder of the morning hour. [A pause.] The Committee on Foreign Relations. [A pause.] The Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, does the Committee on Finance come before the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations was called.

Mr. HOWE. When?

Mr. SHERMAN. Just now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Foreign Relations was called and no response made, but perhaps it is not too late to make it yet.

Mr. HOWE. If it is not too late I would like to respond for the committee long enough to ask the consideration of the Senate to a bill for the relief of Joseph H. Colton, reported by the committee some two or three weeks ago. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have a bill ready from the Committee on Public Lands that I would like to pass while that is being found.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly I have no objection to the call of business from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWE. I would like to have this bill acted on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to pass three or four bills of some importance from the Committee on Finance to which there will be no objection.

Mr. HOWE. There will not be any objection to this.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Can the Senator describe the bill so that the Secretary can find it?

Mr. HOWE. It is a bill for the relief of Joseph H. Colton.

JOSEPH H. COLTON.

The bill (S. No. 1156) for the relief of Joseph H. Colton was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a request to the President of the United States to call upon the government of Bolivia to make payment of the money admitted by itself to be due, with interest thereon, according to the decree of the government of Bolivia of February 1, 1872, to Joseph H. Colton, for maps engraved for that government under a contract made in 1858.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Has the Committee on Foreign Relations other business to present?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Committee on Foreign Relations is through I will go on with the business of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Finance is the next in order.

REFUNDING OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up for consideration House bill No. 2073.

The bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties, and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no moneys collected as duties on imports, in accordance with any decision, ruling, or direction previously made or given by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, except as hereinafter provided, be refunded or repaid, unless in accordance with the judgment of a circuit or district court of the United States giving construction to the law, and from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States; or unless in pursuance of a special appropriation for the particular refund or repayment to be made: Provided, That whenever the Secretary shall be of opinion that such duties have been assessed and collected under an erroneous view of the facts in the case, he may authorize a re-examination and reliquidation in such case, and make such refund in accordance with existing laws as the facts so ascertained shall, in his opinion, justify; but no such reliquidation shall be allowed unless protest and appeal shall have been made as required by law: Provided further, That the restrictive provisions of this act shall not apply to such personal and household effects and other articles, not merchandise, as are by law exempt from duty: And provided also, That this act shall not affect the refund of excess of deposits based on estimated duties nor prevent the correction of errors in liquidation, whether for or against the Government, arising solely upon errors of fact discovered within one year from the date of payment, and, when in favor of the Government, brought to the notice of the collector within ten days from the date of discovery.

SEC. 2. That no ruling or decision once made by the Secretary of the Treasury, giving construction to any law imposing customs duties, shall be reversed or modified adversely to the United States by the same or a succeeding Secretary, except in concurrence with an opinion of the Attorney-General recommending the same, or a judicial decision of a circuit or district court of the United States conflicting with such ruling or decision, and from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, decline to acquiesce in the judgment, decision, or ruling of an inferior court upon any question affecting the interests of the United States, when, in his opinion, such interests require a final adjudication of such question by the court of last resort.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make such regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his annual report to Congress, give a detailed statement of the various sums of money refunded under the provisions of this act or of any other act of Congress relating to the revenue, together with copies of the rulings under which repayments were made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether in that provision of the first section authorizing refunds in case the Attorney-General does not choose to appeal, there should not be provision by which the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury should be taken upon the question of appeal as well. My belief is—and I speak not of the Secretary of the Treasury—that there is always in the Treasury Department more knowledge both of the facts and of the law on which an opinion can be safely formed as to whether an appeal should be taken, than there is in the Department of Justice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the provision of the substitute is sufficient upon that point that the Secretary of the Treasury is not bound to refund unless an appeal is taken to the highest court. I will state that this amendment as it now stands has the hearty approval of the Treasury Department and meets difficulties that were not met by the House bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As I understood the section from the reading—I have not seen it—the Treasury Department would be bound to make refunds whatever its own opinion might be if the Attorney-General should not see fit to take an appeal from a district or circuit court in which judgment had been rendered against the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is exactly the reverse, that he is not bound to make the refund in case the Attorney-General does not appeal.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Attorney-General may be of the opinion that there ought not to be an appeal, and the Secretary of the Treasury may think there ought to be an appeal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think in that case the Secretary of the Treasury is not bound by the decision of the Attorney-General or by his neglect to appeal. Let the Senator look at the language and suggest any amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the Secretary of the Treasury should have authority to direct an appeal to be taken, whatever the opinion of the Attorney-General might be.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will read it he will see that he has.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If that is in, I do not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will go on with the next bill, this being laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside for the time being.

F. V. HAYDEN.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the bill for the relief of F. V. Hayden.

The bill (S. No. 1185) for the relief of F. V. Hayden was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of F. V. Hayden, geologist in charge of the survey of the Territories, to credit him with $3,825, on account of loss of that amount in 1872 by highway robbery committed on his clerk while traveling on a stage-coach between Virginia City, Montana, and Fort Hall, Idaho, bearing that sum of money from one division of the survey to the other; the amount having been lost without any fault or neglect of Hayden or his clerk.

The Committee on Finance proposed an amendment in line 6, to strike "$4,000" and insert "$3,825."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If there is a report in that case I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state the case in a moment. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] reported the bill. This is a case of highway robbery. A portion of the money intrusted to Mr. Hayden to pay his expenses was sent, according to the necessities of his operations, from Virginia City to some point in Montana, and on the way, a long journey in a stage, the stage was overhauled by robbers, and this money taken from the clerk, thirty-eight hundred and some odd dollars. The proof is conclusive; the papers contain the affidavit of the clerk who had charge of the money, and of one or two passengers who were in the stage, and we came to the conclusion that it was a clear case of loss by highway robbery.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUNDING OF CUSTOM DUTIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up the bill which was laid over at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand he thinks it is not necessary to suggest an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of custom duties and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There still remains this point of difficulty: that if the Attorney-General does not take an appeal, as the bill now stands, the Secretary of the Treasury may refuse to make the refunds which would be required by the action of the Attorney-General. It would place the Secretary of the Treasury in a very awkward position, with the opinion of the Attorney-General on the one side and harassed by the claims of importers on the other. I would suggest the addition to the proviso of these words:

And in all cases when the Secretary of the Treasury shall so request, the Attorney-General shall take an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If that could be added to the proviso of the first section, it would do.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BOARD OF AUDIT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1240.

The bill (S. No. 1240) to extend the time within which the board of audit for the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the board of audit constituted by the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, may receive, audit, and allow just claims against the District of the first and second classes mentioned in the sixth section of that act, and claims for refunding sewer-taxes, notwithstanding the limit of time for presentation contained in that act and in the joint resolution to continue the board of audit, approved December 21, 1874.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment, which was to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That such claims shall be presented prior to the 1st day of July next.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball;

A bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton; and

A bill (S. No. 674) to relieve C. D. Anderson of his political disabilities.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4842) for the relief of J. C. McBurney, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up Senate bill No. 1349.

The bill (S. No. 1349) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Senator from Ohio, as we heard the bill read with some difficulty here, whether, in providing for one special commissioner in place of the three now in office, and directing that commissioner, if necessary, to employ some attorney, the bill provides that the commissioner's compensation, the attorney's compensation, if employed, shall come out of the assets of the bank?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The bill reduces considerably the cost of winding up this bank, and fixes the maximum compensation of the one commissioner to $5,000, and the attorney also cannot have more than $5,000.

Mr. OGLESBY. And their compensation comes out of the assets of the institution, and not out of the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The bill was passed.

STAMPS ON BEER CASKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call up the bill reported this morning by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] about beer barrels. I do not know the number of it.

The bill (S. No. 1237) to amend section numbered 3342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the section referred to so as to read:

That every brewer shall obtain from the collector of the district in which his brewery or brewery warehouse is situated, and not otherwise, unless such collector shall fail to furnish the same upon application to him, the proper stamps, and shall affix upon the spigot-hole in the head of every hogshead, barrel, keg, or other receptacle in which any fermented liquor is contained, when sold or removed from such brewery or warehouse, (except in case of removal under permit, as hereinafter provided,) a stamp denoting the amount of the tax required upon such fermented liquor, which stamp shall be destroyed by driving through the same the faucet through which the liquor is to be withdrawn, or an air-faucet of equal size, at the time the vessel is tapped, in case the vessel is tapped through the other spigot-hole, (of which there shall be but two, one in the head and one in the side,) and shall also, at the time of affixing such stamp, cancel the same by writing or imprinting thereon the name of the person, firm, or corporation by whom such liquor was made, or the initial letters thereof, and the date when canceled. Every brewer who refuses or neglects to affix and cancel the stamps required by law in the manner aforesaid, or who affixes a false or fraudulent stamp thereto, or knowingly permits the same to be done, shall pay a penalty of $100 for each barrel or package on which such omission or fraud occurs, and be imprisoned not more than one year.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill in relation to affixing stamps on brewers' casks."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4842) for the relief of J. C. McBurney was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair calls up the unfinished business of yesterday, being House bill No. 796,

Mr. SPRAGUE. Pending the reading of the civil-rights bill I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to call up and have passed a bill from the Committee on Public Lands granting the right of way to a railroad. It is a short bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont insists upon the regular order.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot listen, because the understanding was that nothing should intervene pending this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, and will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. THURMAN. In section 4, line 4, I move to strike out the words "or of any State." That section is the section in regard to juries.

EXECUTION LAW OF DAKOTA.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose I may be allowed to make a report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive the report, if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask leave to make a statement of about two minutes before I make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the Territory of Dakota there are two laws upon the statute-books exempting a homestead and a certain amount of personal property from liability under execution. At the session of the Legislature in Dakota just adjourned they passed a law upon the subject of the homestead, and by the twentieth section thereof they repealed all laws which exempted personal property from execution. By a letter in my hands from the governor of the Territory and also other evidence before the committee, it appears that that was a mistake in repealing all laws by this twentieth section exempting personal property from execution. The House of Representatives has passed a bill declaring the twentieth section of that act inoperative.

It was before the Committee on the Judiciary this morning, and I am instructed to report the bill back and ask its passage. Unless something of the kind is done in that Territory now, so severely scourged by the grasshoppers last summer and otherwise, every particle of property is subject to execution. I report the bill back and ask that it be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the twentieth section of the act named in the title shall not be construed as an absolute repeal of chapter 37 of the laws of Dakota, approved May 12, 1862, but only as repealing so much of chapter 37 as is inconsistent with the first-named act, and that no other effect shall be given to the twentieth section.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1337) to disapprove section 20 of the act of the territorial Legislature of the Territory of Dakota entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the said conveyance," approved January 14, 1875, ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely, the bill just passed superseding it.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

PUYALLUP VALLEY COAL COMPANY.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill S. No. 1083.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 1083) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Puyallup Valley Coal Company, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 6, section 1, after the word "Territory" to insert "not occupied under the pre-emption or homestead laws nor reserved for sale;" so as to make the clause read:

That there is hereby granted to the Puyallup Valley Coal Company, a corporation formed under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Oregon, the right of way over the public domain of the United States in Washington Territory, not occupied under the pre-emption or homestead laws nor reserved for sale, from such coal mine or mines in said Territory as said corporation may now or hereafter own or occupy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 17, section 1, to strike out the word "two" and insert "one;" in line 20 to strike out the words "obtaining water and conducting water to the stations;" in line 21 after the word "wharves" to insert the words "but in no case exceeding two hundred feet in width;" so as to read:

Such right of way to be sufficient for constructing, operating, and protecting such railroads and telegraph lines, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, except where a greater width is required to give room for bridge-foundations, cuts, and embankments, or for water-stations, or for depots, turn-outs, sidings, and wharves, but in no case exceeding two hundred feet in width.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 22 to strike out the following words:

And in such cases no greater quantity of land is to be appropriated against the consent of the owner than is required for the safe construction and convenient use of said road and the accommodation of its business.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And the condemnation for such appropriation shall be in conformity to the laws of said Territory.

Mr. PRATT. That amendment should not be concurred in. The bill was committed to me for examination and report and there is a mistake in presenting that amendment. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not sure that this bill is right in itself; but the Senator from Vermont who is not now in his seat [Mr. EDMUNDS] a few moments ago objected to taking up this bill. He is absent for a moment.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Not this bill merely, but to general legislation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This bill was then proposed and he objected to it and everything else as being a departure from the arrangement entered into last night in regard to the bill that is regularly before the Senate. I have not attended to the business; I do not know how this has happened to get in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill has been taken up already and is now being considered and several amendments have been adopted. I simply desire to state that this amendment is a mistake on the part of the committee, as the Senator from Indiana has said.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is so.

Mr. MITCHELL. It should not be concurred in.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know what the bill is. Will the Senator in charge of it state what it is or have it read? It seems to be a railroad bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is merely to give the right of way for a railroad in Oregon one hundred feet in width with the right to take material within the grant.

Mr. SHERMAN. No land grant?

Mr. SPRAGUE. No land grant, not an acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair.) The bill will be read as amended.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I can have the attention of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] I would like to inquire whether this business offered by unanimous consent is objectionable to the gentlemen on the other side in view of the understanding. If it be, I shall feel it to be my duty of course to insist on the regular order because this takes time, and if my friend from Delaware and his friends think it trenches upon the engagement, I must certainly insist upon the regular order.

Mr. BAYARD. There are very few members on this side in their seats. I believe there was no objection made when this bill was taken up, for want of attention on our part. This bill came in in that way passing over the regular order informally, subject to be called up at any time, and therefore there was no dissent expressed which the Chair asked for at the time. It was not, however, the intention of this side of the Chamber that any business should be interpolated except subject to the regular order being resumed at any instant it should be called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then unless my friend and his friends are satisfied that this order may be disposed of subject to the regular order, I will object now to its further consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the honorable Senator is entirely correct; but there was some misunderstanding among gentlemen on this side as to the order of their addressing the Senate upon the pending measure.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let us have this bill passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand this bill can be passed in a moment.

Mr. MORTON. I do not want to interfere with the passage of this bill but I wish to make a remark after it is disposed of.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that the bill is a very uncertain and indefinite grant of right of way. It is not from any fixed point to any other fixed point. It is from the mines which this corporation own or which they may hereafter own, and it gives them the right to the wood and everything on this strip of one hundred feet or two hundred feet between two indefinite points, and is a most valuable grant even if the railroad is never built.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state in answer to the Senator from New Jersey that this company is organized under a general incorporation law of the State of Oregon, and by virtue of the provisions of that law the company is compelled to fix certainly and positively the termini of its road. There can be no question about that. I presume that at the time this bill was presented the company was not organized. Large coal mines have been discovered recently in that Territory. The company has been organized only very recently. Under the general provisions of the incorporation law of Oregon they are compelled to fix the termini. Of course they only take by virtue of the provisions of this bill in view of the line fixed under the provisions of the general corporation law of the State of Oregon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand it so. I understand this bill to give to this company the right to take the public domain, a strip one hundred feet wide, from any mine they now own or from any they may hereafter purchase to the waters of Puget Sound or to any point on the Northern Pacific Railroad. Neither the point of beginning nor the point of ending is fixed at all, and there is nothing in the bill as I understand which requires the company to build the road at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I know nothing of this bill except as I learn now from hearing it read and from looking at it. The feature to which the Senator from New Jersey calls attention strikes me; and there is one other which I think I ought to bring to the notice of the Senate. It is true that the road is to be built "from such coal mine or mines in said Territory as said corporation may now or hereafter own or occupy." Therefore the terminus at one end is entirely afloat. Then it is to be built "to navigable waters on Commencement Bay, or other point or points on the waters of Puget Sound, or Admiralty Inlet, or to some point or points on the Northern Pacific Railroad."

It is a grant of the right of way "together with timber and other material on said right of way," and so on. Without spending a moment upon that, the Senate will see what it means.

The other point to which I want to call attention is this: No time is fixed within which this road must be commenced, none within which it must be completed. As far as I can discover from reading the bill, this grant is to take place to be rendered certain as to location from beginning to end when and not till the grantee chooses to fix it; and when that is done, for all time that I can discover without limitation, there it remains a grant and a railroad may not be commenced during the life of men now living. It seems to me it is a very broad bill in its effects.

Mr. THURMAN. I demand the regular order.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio demands the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to call up House bill No. 2747.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I cannot give way for anything.

Mr. President, the pending question is on the motion submitted by me to strike out of the fourth section of the bill the words "or of any State." Of course no vote is to be taken on the motion until the hour of two o'clock to-morrow, but I have seen fit to make the motion now in order that it may receive that consideration which it cannot receive under a rule limiting debate to five minutes.

Mr. President, the question presented by this amendment to the Senate is whether, apart from any question of policy, it is competent for the Congress of the United States to regulate the qualifications of jurors in a State court. The section as it now stands provides—

That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the causes aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

When this bill was under consideration in the Senate at the last session, or a bill similar to this, I listened in vain for one word showing the constitutionality of that provision. I listened in vain for any word of argument to show that it is in the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate by law who shall be jurors in the State courts. No argument was made within my hearing to maintain any such proposition; but it was very distinctly and clearly demonstrated by you, Mr. President, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair,) as well as by others, that no such power can be deduced from any provision in the Constitution. No one will pretend that before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment such a provision as this would have been constitutional, and no one will pretend that there is anything in the fourteenth amendment to give the slightest color to such a position unless it be the first section of that amendment. Before considering that, allow me to say that neither the thirteenth nor the fifteenth amendment has anything whatever to do with this question. It all turns upon section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, which is in these words:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I propose to take up this section sentence by sentence and see whether by any fair reasoning whatever the power asserted in this bill to prescribe the qualifications of jurors in a State court can be logically or reasonably deduced. The first sentence is:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Manifestly that confers upon them no right to sit as jurors; and if it did it would confer upon every woman a right to be a juror; it would confer upon every minor a right to be a juror. The mere fact that persons born within the United States or here naturalized become citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside, confers no right to be selected or to act as jurors.

Let me illustrate that. Take the case of a person naturalized who cannot speak or understand one word of the English language. May not the State say that he shall not be a juror? Does not State after State declare that such persons shall not be jurors? Does not State after State require as a qualification to sit upon a jury that a person shall understand the English language—I do not mean read it; I do not mean write it; but at least that he shall understand it? Some go further and require that he shall read and write the English language. But if the interpretation asserted in this bill were given to this sentence in the article, then it would be unlawful to deprive any citizen of the right to sit upon juries. Let us see the next sentence:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Is it one of the privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States that he shall be a juror in a State court? Who ever heard of such a proposition as that? The Supreme Court has expressly decided in the Slaughter-house cases that the sentence which I have just read only relates to the immunities and privileges of an individual as a citizen of the United States and not to any privilege or any immunity possessed by him in virtue of his State citizenship. No decision can be clearer than that. In fact it required no decision to establish that, for the language is as plain as it could possibly be. The language is—I must repeat it—"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States;" not of citizens of the State but "of citizens of the United States;" and when, pray, was it ever a privilege or an immunity of a citizen of the United States that he should be entitled to sit upon a jury in a State court? When was it that the bare fact of citizenship of the United States deprived a State of the right to provide what should be the qualification of an individual to entitle him to sit as a juror in its own courts?

The next clause is:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

It is not depriving any individual of life or liberty or property to refuse to seat him in the jury-box. The sentence then concludes, and this concludes the section:

Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

She does not deny to any individual within the jurisdiction of the State the equal protection of her laws when she provides what shall be the qualification of the jurors in that State. No one can by any fair reasoning whatever strain that provision to cover such a case as this and to authorize Congress to set aside the State laws, to abrogate them or to modify them in any particular in relation to the qualification of jurors in the State courts. Why, Mr. President, are not the State courts the creatures of the State constitution? Are they not created by the State and do they not derive their whole authority from the State? How, then, can it be that a tribunal thus constituted can be thus regulated in its essential composition by an act of the Congress of the United States? If you can do this in respect to jurors you can do it in respect to judges; you may overthrow the constitution of the State in respect to her judges just precisely as much as you can overthrow her constitution and her laws in respect to her jurors.

There is no fair reasoning, there is no fair logic, there is no deduction admitted by any principle of legal interpretation or of any treatise on logic that admits a stretch of these words so as to justify this provision in this bill. If you can do that, then I say that every constitution of a State and every right of a State is at the absolute mercy of Congress. If you can indulge in a latitude of interpretation in respect to this section which I have read, and which is the only section that bears on the subject or that can be supposed to bear upon it which would admit the constitutionality of this provision in the bill, then I repeat there is not one single right of a State, not one single privilege of a State, not one single safeguard of a State that is not in the absolute discretion of Congress to destroy. Have we come to that? Are the States mere counties and all sovereignty in the Government of the United States? Are the States simply sovereign in name in respect to their reserved rights if Congress, by any such interpretation of this amendment as that by which this bill is sought to be sustained, can declare that they have no reserved rights at all?

I confess that I am amazed that in the face of the plain language of this section, in the face of the solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States adverse to this proposition, it yet is pressed upon the Congress of the United States, and we are asked to do what the language of the Constitution does not authorize us to do, and what the solemn decision of our Supreme Court declares we have no power whatever to do. Why, sir, what respect can there be for government when the Congress of the United States sets this decision of its Supreme Court thus at defiance, sets common sense and reason at defiance, and in plain, flagrant, inexcusable violation of our Federal system, of the rights of the States and of the language of our fundamental law, usurps a power that no sane man can believe exists? Sir, this language may be strong, but it is no stronger than is warranted. I say that no sane man can believe that this power exists, and when I say "sane" I mean it. I say that no man unbiased by his prejudices, unbiased by party, unbiased by his desire to carry a party triumph, no matter what may be the fundamental law of the land, can ever in his sane moments come to the conclusion that this power is within the Federal Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, I have very little hope that anything I can say will arrest this measure or even procure the adoption of this amendment. I know that all reverence for the rights of the States has been fading out of the minds of Senators here ever since I have held a seat in this body and for years before. I know that that which was most sacred with our forefathers, that feeling without which this Constitution never would have been adopted, that sacred regard for the rights of the States and the people, that belief that it was only by a Federal system that those rights could be preserved and this Union preserved—I know that those ideas have been fading away under the influences produced by civil war, under the influences of mammon and of greed and under the dictates of the narrowest fanaticism that ever distorted a human mind. I have very little hope of making any impression upon that prevailing tendency now; but I do yet believe—at least I will not give up the hope—that the American people will ere long arouse to a sense of the danger which menaces the whole system founded by our fathers, under which we have achieved unparalleled prosperity, and whose destruction will be the death-knell of liberty and the death-knell of the existence of the Republic.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Ohio lead me to make an observation upon the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. If I differ in opinion from the honorable Senator from Ohio, it is not strange. I do not partake of the view he expresses as to the change going on even in the Senate. He says that respect for the rights of the States has been gradually fading out in the minds of Senators since he has had a seat in this body. What inference we are to draw from that remark, as to the influence he may have had upon the Senate, I cannot say. I have not observed that effect, and I doubt the existence of the fact. Nor is there in the country a disposition to interfere with the rights of the States, nor is there any change in opinion as to the power of States, except as the power of the States may have been limited by the amendments that have been made by the Constitution. I feel that this change which has taken place is due to the respect for the Constitution in those particulars wherein the powers of the States have been limited, and not from any disposition to deprive any State of its constitutional powers.

The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments did limit the power of the States; they did extend the power of the General Government; and the question we are considering almost continually is the extent to which the power of the States has been limited by these amendments and the extent to which the power of the General Government has been carried by these several amendments.

I am not disposed to discuss the Slaughter-house decision, as it is called. It will stand legally and politically for what it is worth. It related to a particular case. In that case and in every other case like that, if there shall be another case like that, it is law; but it is not law beyond the case in which the opinion was rendered, and therefore for myself I dismiss that case as a legislator when I come to consider new propositions.

Mr. STEWART. That was by a divided court.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It was by a divided court, but nevertheless the opinion of the majority of the court is the law of the case, but it is not law beyond the case; it is not law with reference to the rights of States generally, and certainly is not law for the Senate when the Senate is engaged in considering a question which is a different question from that on which the court passed.

In the fourteenth amendment I find ample power for what is proposed in the bill under consideration. The fourth section of this bill does not propose, as was suggested by the Senator from Ohio, to decide the qualifications of jurors in the States. The illustration which he gave to the Senate was not an illustration in point. He says, if a State shall provide by law that a person who does not understand the English language shall not sit as a juror, is the United States to come in and by legislative authority decide or declare that such person may sit as a juror? I think no one would contend that there was any such power in the National Government, and certainly no such power is asserted in this bill.

The fourth section is:

That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law—

That is, by the law of the State—

shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

That is merely by the General Government a declaration of equality of rights among citizens of the several States and of each particular State in reference to service upon the juries of the State and in the State courts.

Mr. THURMAN. Will it trouble the Senator if I interrupt him?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not in the least.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I beg leave to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the first section of the fourteenth amendment, on which he relies of course to sustain the bill, has no reference whatsoever to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." No such words are in the section. No allusion is made to that distinction. Therefore I ask the Senator, if there is power to say "that no citizen," in the language of this bill, "possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror of any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," why have you not equal power to strike out those words "on account of race, or color, or previous condition of servitude" and insert "on account of his ignorance of the English tongue?" Why can you not do it; or why can you not add after the word "servitude" the words "or on account of his ignorance of the English tongue;" for there is not one word in the first section of the fourteenth amendment that relates to race, or color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is all very true. The fourth section of this bill provides for equality in certain particulars where the equality of citizens is assailed, and not elsewhere. It is assailed or threatened in many of the States of the Union, upon the ground that certain persons are of a particular race or of a particular color or have been subject in times past to the condition of slaves. Now, in order to protect those people against discriminations for these reasons, this provision of the bill contemplates that if they are qualified in other respects as the laws of the State require for other citizens, they shall not be excluded from the jury-box for these reasons; and, although there is not in the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment any reference to these conditions, there nevertheless is a declaration which covers these conditions, and might cover and in fact does cover many other conditions:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

What does that phrase mean? It means, first and chiefly and preeminent, as the law of the land, that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." That is the first great primal truth of the fourteenth amendment; and what is the first privilege, right, immunity under that declaration? It is that they are citizens of the several States "wherein they reside." Therefore the leading doctrine of that provision of the Constitution is that all the persons described in it are citizens of the United States, and by virtue of their citizenship they are citizens of the State wherein they reside. That is the first immunity. The chief privilege, the great right established by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution is that citizens of the United States are citizens of the State wherein they reside. That is the immunity, that is the privilege, that is the right. Now, then, what follows?

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Not "of citizens of the States," but "of citizens of the United States." And what is the first privilege of citizens of the United States? That they are citizens of the State wherin they reside. And what is the chief right of the citizen of a State? That he is the equal before the law of every other citizen. By the fourteenth amendment the people of the United States, through their constituted authorities, have grasped the question of securing to citizens of the United States their rights as citizens of the several States; and the first right is the right of equality before the law. Therefore, while we cannot go into the States and say what the rights of citizens of the State in the State shall be, whenever there is a law in a State or a provision of its constitution which secures to citizens generally their rights and discriminates against other citizens, that discrimination is not only against citizens as citizens of the State, but against those citizens as citizens of the United States, and in our power under the fourteenth amendment to protect them as citizens of the United States, we pass the boundaries of the several States by authority of the Constitution and secure to our citizens, the citizens of the United States, their rights under the laws of the States as citizens of the State.

Mr. THURMAN. Now let me ask the Senator a question right there. Where does he find any foundation for the position that either citizenship of the United States or citizenship of a State gives a person a right to sit upon a jury?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not find it at all.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I guess not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not need to look for it. As a citizen of the United States and as a part of the law-making power of the United States I only look beyond, within the jurisdiction of the State, and see what the rights and privileges and immunities of citizens of the State generally are under the laws and constitution of the State. Then I say if there be a citizen of the United States within that jurisdiction who is deprived in any particular of his rights as a citizen of the State, under the laws of the State, I can, under the Constitution of the United States and as a part of the law-making power, invoke the authority of the United States, legislative, judicial, and executive, for the protection of that citizen in his just rights as a citizen of the State. The Government of the United States can take the humblest citizen in the State of Ohio who by the constitution or the laws of that State may be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity that is conceded to the citizens of that State generally, and lift him to the dignity of equality as a citizen of that State; and all that is claimed under the fourth section of this bill is that you shall not, in the State of Ohio or in Massachusetts or in Maryland, say that a man shall not sit upon a jury because he is a black man or because he is of the German race or because he has been held in slavery, and I might say for other reasons. If for other reasons discriminations were made by the law of any of these States, we might under the fourteenth amendment protect men from such discriminations.

Therefore I do not yield to the Senator from Ohio in my respect for the constitution or the sovereign power of any State. What they have, that I will assert. What they are entitled to, that I will defend. What by the Constitution of the United States they can invoke, that I will help to protect; but I will at the same time invoke the power of the Government of the United States, under the Constitution of the United States, to protect the citizens of the United States in the several States in their equal rights under the laws and constitutions of the several States wherein they may reside.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the fourth section of this bill does not establish any qualifications for jurors in the State courts. It makes no pretense of that kind. It leaves the States to fix those qualifications as they see proper. A State may provide that no man shall sit upon a jury who is not thirty years old, or if you please fifty years old. The State may provide that no man shall sit upon a jury who cannot read or write; that no man shall sit upon a jury who is not worth $500 or $5,000. The State is left perfectly free to fix the qualifications of jurors as she sees proper; but by this bill she is restrained from prohibiting any man from sitting upon a jury simply because of his race or color if he has all the other qualifications required by law. If the State requires a juror to be able to read and write, to have been a citizen of the State for two years, to be worth $1,000 in money, this bill would prevent that State from excluding a colored man from sitting upon a jury if he possessed all the other qualifications. That is the point. It does not assume to say who shall be a juror or what shall be his qualifications, but it does assume to say that if the colored man has all the qualifications to sit upon a jury required of a white man, he shall not be excluded on account of his color.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fourteenth amendment, upon which he has commented. I will call his attention to the first section of that amendment and to the concluding clause of the first section.

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I should like the distinguished Senator from Ohio to tell the Senate what is meant by the equal protection of the laws. No State shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. Does that simply mean that each man shall be equally protected or have an equal right to be protected from an assault and battery, from assassination? Is it confined to that? Not at all. It means in its broadest sense, it means in its true sense, that no State shall deny to any man the equal advantage of the law, the equal benefit of the law, the equal protection of the law. It means that all men shall be equals before the law, and that no man shall be denied on account of his race or color the equal advantage and benefit of the law. That is what it means. It cannot mean anything else.

Now I would like to submit to the judgment of this Senate and of the country this proposition: Whether the colored man enjoys the equal protection of the law, the equal benefit of the law, if colored men are not permitted to sit upon juries? Will any man pretend that where the right to sit upon juries is given exclusively to white men, the colored men of that State have the equal protection of the laws? I would like to hear my friend from Ohio, who has been prompt to discuss this question, upon that point.

Mr. THURMAN. And you shall.

Mr. MORTON. Does a State that gives the exclusive right to sit upon juries to white men, give the equal protection of the laws of that State to colored men? I say no. I say no upon the broadest principles of common sense.

Why, Mr. President, one of the most important principles of the common law that has come down to us from our fathers, established in England long ago, was that every man had a right to be tried by his peers. What is meant by that? Tried by his equals, those in the same general condition of society; that you cannot give a higher class the exclusive right to pass upon the rights of a lower class; that they have the right to be tried by a jury of the neighborhood, a right of trial by their peers. And we see how carefully this principle of trial by jury is guarded. We see that no man who has expressed an opinion is allowed to sit upon a jury, and sometimes weeks are spent in getting juries which are perfectly unprejudiced, who have never given an opinion on the case, who have no notion in regard to it.

Now, I ask if with the prejudices against the colored race entertained by the white race, even in some of the Northern States and certainly in all of the Southern States, the colored man enjoys the equal protection of the laws, if the jury that is to try him for a crime or determine his right to property must be made up exclusively of the white race?

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. Do I understand the Senator to deny that the State should have the right to pass a law providing that a colored man charged with murder should be tried by men of his own color?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I said no such thing.

Mr. MERRIMON. Or that a foreigner, if he were charged with murder, should be tried by a jury of foreigners.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I do not say that.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I put this question——

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator from Indiana will be allowed to conclude and then we can answer him.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. If the State of North Carolina by law provides that no man but a white man shall sit upon the jury, though it was to try a colored man for his life or to try his rights of property, I mean to say that the whole colored race of North Carolina does not enjoy the equal protection of the laws, and how any man of common sense can deny it I cannot understand.

Mr. WEST. Reverse the proposition and how would it do in South Carolina?

Mr. MORTON. Reverse the proposition and we should soon hear an outcry on the other side. There is the State of South Carolina with a large majority of colored men. Suppose that State should pass a law that no man should sit on a jury but a colored man; that wherever a white man is arraigned for a crime or whose rights of property are undergoing investigation, that right shall be determined alone by a colored jury. Then we should find the white men of South Carolina coming up here and claiming the benefit of the fourteenth amendment. They would say they were denied the equal protection of the laws in the broadest sense; that they were to be tried by a race against whom they had prejudices and who had prejudices against them. They would claim that they could not be effectually protected by a colored jury. We know they would. They are crying out now even because colored men there are allowed equal rights. They are now crying aloud that they are not enjoying equal protection against colored men. But if white men were excluded from the jury in South Carolina, just as colored men are excluded from the juries in many Southern States, we know very well they would at once claim the benefit of the fourteenth amendment and say they were denied the equal protection of the laws.

Now, sir, here I put this bill upon a ground that is impregnable. No sophistry can answer it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] smiles. Let him tell the Senate first what is meant by "the equal protection of the laws." Let him then answer this question directly whether the colored race in any State would have the equal protection of the laws if they are to be tried exclusively for crime or to have their rights of property adjudicated by white men. Or reverse the case. Would the white race have the equal protection of the laws if all their rights were to be determined in courts of justice by colored men?

Mr. President, the trouble is that the rights of the colored men are not recognized by those who make this argument. They do not comprehend the spirit of these amendments. The fourteenth amendment was intended to place, and does place, men on an equality before the law. That is all. Whatever is the law for the white man must be the law for the colored man. Whatever is the law for the colored man must be equally the law for the white man. We do not say what that law shall be. The State may make the law as it seems proper; but whatever shall be the character of that law it must apply equally to all races upon the same precise conditions.

Mr. THURMAN. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. MORTON. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want to interrupt you.

Mr. MORTON. I will yield to my friend. Perhaps I shall have something further to say after a while.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has very truly said that his argument cannot be answered by sophistry. But it can be answered by reason, and answered so conclusively that even he must be compelled to admit that there is no soundness in it. If he will do me the honor to listen to me for a few minutes, I will convince even him that there is not one particle of foundation for the argument he has just made. He places his defense of this provision upon the last sentence of the first section of article 14, which says:

Nor shall any State * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The Senator says that no class of persons receive equal protection of the laws if they are excluded from the jury-box. Now, the first thing that I have to say to that Senator is that not one woman in all the United States or the Territories thereof, outside of Wyoming Territory, is qualified to sit in a jury box. Are they not equally protected? Do they not receive the protection of the laws? When did it come that our mothers and wives and sisters were deprived of the equal protection of the laws? But that is not all. Do not our children under the age of twenty-one years receive the equal protection of the law? Yet not one of them is qualified to sit in a jury-box. Again, this clause upon which the Senator relies covers other persons than citizens. It covers every person, alien as well as citizen. Let us see what it is:

No State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

You shall not deny it to the alien; you shall not deny it to the Chinaman; you shall not deny it even to the Indian, though he be not taxed. You shall not deny it to any person within your jurisdiction, be he sane or be he insane, be he old or be he young, be he innocent or be he criminal, be he learned or be he ignorant. Every human being within the jurisdiction of the State shall be entitled to the equal protection of the laws; but is every human being in that State entitled to sit upon a jury? Do you deprive the minor of the equal protection of the law when you try his case by men of mature age? Do you deprive women of the equal protection of the laws when you try their cases by their brothers or husbands or fathers? Do you deprive the Chinaman of the equal protection of the laws when you try his case by citizens of the United States? Do you deprive the alien here in the District of Columbia of the equal protection of the laws when you try his case by the citizens of the United States and residents of this District? Does Ohio deprive anybody of the equal protection of the laws when she declares, as her statute does, that no man shall be a juryman unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector? Does that deprive all persons who are not electors of the equal protection of the laws? The idea which the Senator says no sane man can contest is simply, with great respect to him, without the slightest foundation. "The equal protection of the laws" is one thing; political privileges are another thing; and privileges to administer the laws of the land as judges, jurors, or in any other character are another and quite a different thing. "The equal protection of the laws" covers those laws which are designed for the protection of life, liberty, and property.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator——

Mr. THURMAN. But now let me finish. I will convince the Senator out of his own mouth. The Senator says that it is perfectly competent for the States to require a property qualification for the jury-box. He says they may require a qualification of $5,000 of property; that they may require, as was formerly required in many of the States and in England, a freehold qualification. But I take the Senator's own illustration: they may require a property qualification of $5,000 in order to entitle a man to be a juror. If they can do that, what becomes of the Senator's argument? Are all men who do not own $5,000 worth of property deprived of the equal protection of the laws? I want the Senator to answer that question when he comes to reply. He says that any State, Louisiana, Mississippi, may establish a property qualification for jurors and put it as high as they please to put it, say to $5,000. That would exclude ninety-nine out of every hundred negro men there, or more than that; it would in effect exclude almost the whole colored race; it would make your provision in this bill not worth the paper upon which it is printed. But the Senator says that can be done. Then I ask him if all persons not owning $5,000 worth of property would be deprived of the equal protection of the laws?

Sir, it cannot be necessary to pursue this subject further. As I said before, the clause of the amendment which he reads has no relation to citizenship. It covers every human being within the jurisdiction of a State. It was intended to shield the foreigner, to shield the wayfarer, to shield the Indian, the Chinaman, every human being within the jurisdiction of a State from any deprivation of an equal protection of the laws; and the very fact that it embraces aliens, the very fact that it embraces the traveler passing through, shows that it has no relation whatsoever to qualifications for political office or to qualifications for the administration of justice in the courts.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Just one word before the honorable Senator from Indiana proceeds. Furthermore the honorable Senator from Indiana has said that the States can impose this qualification on jurors, that they must read and write. The States can do that in addition to the other qualifications as to property, he has said. Then are those people who cannot read and write (and that would comprise about three million nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand of the four million of colored people in the South) and who are therefore excluded from the jury-box, outside all protection of law?

Mr. MORTON. I submit in the first place that the statement and admission of my friend from Maryland is simply begging the question, as was the argument of my friend from Ohio. I say that so far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned States perhaps may do this, but they must do it to all races and colors alike; they must put them all on the same footing. They cannot require the qualification of reading and writing of one race and not require it of another. There must be equality in it; and so with regard to the property qualification.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. One question. Is race or color mentioned in the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. MORTON. I want to come to the argument of my friend from Ohio, and I submit it to him now that he admitted his whole argument away. Very reluctantly and gingerly he undertook to tell what was meant by "the equal protection of the laws." He said it meant equal protection to life, liberty, and property; and so say I. How are the laws to give equal protection to life, liberty, and property? I will bring him right back to the point, and I want no dodging upon it. I ask him if colored men have equal protection for life, liberty, and property when the power to try their rights to life, liberty, and property is placed exclusively in the hands of another race of men?

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator right there—

Mr. MORTON. Answer that question.

Mr. THURMAN. They have; just as they have in France, just as they have in England. Every man in France has the equal protection of the laws. Every man in England has the equal protection of the laws, and I am sorry to say, a great deal better protection than he has here.

Mr. MORTON. My friend is inclining very strongly, I think, toward a different kind of government. He says they have in England and they have in France. Is that true? I am not as familiar with the laws of England and France as my friend is; but that does not answer the question. My question is this, and I come right back to it, and I know my friend cannot answer it properly without admitting away the whole case: I ask him whether the colored men of North Carolina have the equal protection of the laws when the control of their right to life, liberty, and property is placed exclusively in the hands of another race of men, hostile to them, in many respects prejudiced against them, men who have been educated and taught to believe that colored men have no civil and political rights that white men are bound to respect. And yet the Senator would tell me that that is giving them the equal protection of the laws. I say no; the common sense of mankind will revolt at that proposition.

But my friend, chivalrous and bold as he is in defending the doctrine of inequality, falls back under the protection of the women. [Laughter.] He gets behind the ladies. That has always been the tactics. When they propose to deny a whole race, men and women, all civil and political rights, they will go and get behind a woman, and say "do women vote; do women sit on juries?" His proposition is that because the law denies to women of all races, black and white, the right to sit on the juries, therefore you have the right to deny both men and women of the colored race any right to participate in the courts of justice; and he makes that argument. It only requires that proposition to be stated in order that it may be decided. I am one of those who believe in the right of women to vote, and I have always believed in that; but because that right has been withheld from them, no argument can be made on that ground. But leaving that entirely out of view, if women are not allowed to sit upon juries, the men of their own race and color and of their own condition of life are allowed to sit upon juries and decide upon their rights of life, of liberty, and of property; but in this case that right is to be taken away from a whole race. White women are tried by white men, but colored women are to be tried by white men also and not by colored men. Is there any equality there, I ask the Senator? O, no. Mr. President, the time has come to put away all this jargon; it belongs to the past. My friend talks like a Rip Van Winkle who had been asleep twenty years. He talks the talk of twenty or thirty years ago, when the great body of the colored men in this country were slaves and were bought and sold like cattle in the market, and when the prejudices of slavery extended all through the North even, and took from the colored men there in most of the States their civil rights. We have gone past that period; thank God we have outlived it; and now there is no slave to walk the soil of this whole country. We have a constitutional amendment that makes all men equal before the law. It does not make them all equal in point of intellect, in point of property, in point of education, but they have equal rights before the law. They have the same right to struggle, they have the same right to get rich, and they have the same right to hold office; they have the same right to become the rulers of the land, provided they have the talent, the industry, and the character to obtain these things. That is what we mean by equality before the law. I do not know of a greater oppression than that here aimed. Why, how important is it in the Southern States, how important is it in those States where slavery recently existed and where its traces still remain and where the education and the feelings and the passions of slavery still remain, to establish this great right, that no man shall be excluded from the jury because of his color if he is otherwise qualified. If he has the qualifications the law requires of white men, then give him the right to sit upon the jury the same as white men.

But my friend from Ohio thought his protection in getting behind the women was not sufficient, and so he got behind the children. [Laughter.] Why he says you do not allow children to vote; you do not allow these pages to vote, and therefore you should exclude a whole race. Because you do not allow a boy ten years old to vote you ought to exclude a colored man fifty years old from voting. That is the argument. That is the force of his logic. Because you exclude infants from the right to go to the polls or sit in the jury-box, therefore you must exclude a whole race of adults, of men who have arrived at mature age, from the enjoyment of the plainest common rights. That is the kind of logic which defends their great wrongs and these inequalities. It is the logic of prejudice; a logic that has gone by under the events of war and the progress of the times; a logic that might have been tolerable twenty-five years ago, but is now out of place. My friend, if he had kept pace with the times, would not have reintroduced it into this body.

Not only that, but he gets behind the aliens also, men who come here from foreign lands but have not yet become citizens of the United States; and, by the way, let me make a suggestion on that point. Suppose a State passed a law that no man of foreign birth should sit upon a jury. He may have lived here twenty-five or thirty years, become naturalized, be among the very best of our people, as many of them are. And suppose a State should pass a law that no man of foreign birth shall sit upon a jury, what would be the outcry? It would be said that you were denying to men of foreign birth the equal protection of the laws, that you placed the juries exclusively in the hands of native Americans who have prejudices against foreigners, just as white men have prejudices against black men. Would it not be said in that case that you were denying to men of foreign birth the equal protection of the laws because their rights would be liable to the exclusive determination of native-born Americans who had some lingering prejudices against men of foreign birth?

O, no, Mr. President, there is no argument on that side of the question at all. It is simply bringing up old prejudices that ought to be buried in the same tomb with the rebellion.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, when I was a boy at school we had an old Scotch professor of logic who was very exigent in his rule that we should reason fairly and logically, and very severe upon any one who departed from true logical reasoning in the consideration of any subject. He was asked one day by one of the students who had found himself pinned by his adversary in a corner by the inexorable logic of the argument, "Professor, what must I do in this strait in which I find myself?" Said he, "My son, I do not know anything you can do but to declaim." [Laughter.] Now, I think that my friend from Indiana must have taken lessons from that same old professor, for when he found himself driven in a corner by inexorable logic, his answer is to make a stump speech. I submit to the Senator whether he has answered my reply at all.

What was his argument, his great discovery, that which superseded all that the Senator from Massahusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] had said? It was that the last sentence of the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment declared that no State should deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Obviously that relates not simply to classes, but to every individual. And then he asserted that if any individual was deprived of the right to sit in the jury-box, that deprived him of the equal protection of the laws. I asked him, "Are women deprived of the equal protection of the laws?" What was his answer to that question? Why, that the Senator from Ohio gets behind the women. That is the logical answer of the able Senator from Indiana! That is the logical answer of the leader of the republican party on this floor! That is a specimen of his ability to reason and to reason logically! I have only to remark upon that that I am in favor of giving the white women of this country as much protection of the laws as I give the colored man, and I am not in favor of giving him any more protection of the laws than I give to my wife, my sister, and my daughter. If the Senator calls that getting behind the women, then God grant that I may always have such an array before me.

But further, I showed to the Senator that this clause on which he relies applies to every human being within the jurisdiction of a State, to the alien, to the mere transitory traveler; and I asked him if they were not entitled and did not receive the equal protection of the laws although they could not sit in a jury-box. What answer does he make to that? He makes a speech against know-nothingism; and that is the answer of the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

Again, the Senator has admitted that a State might require a property qualification for a juror, and fixed the amount himself at $5,000. Then I asked him, if that could be lawfully done, where was the equal protection of the laws for the poor men of the country who have not $5,000 of property; and the Senator does not see fit to take any notice at all of that category in which he has placed himself; but he goes on and answers by making a great speech in favor of liberty to the colored race and a speech glorifying the results of the civil war in freeing the negro from the slavery under which he formerly groaned! That is the logical answer upon a constitutional question! That is the logical answer in interpreting the Constitution of the United States, and interpreting too a provision of the Constitution which makes not the slightest allusion to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude!"

There is not one word in this first section of the fourteenth amendment that has any relation to race, color, or previous condition of servitude; but the Senator goes out of the way, clear outside of that, and finding some evil as he supposes existing in the country, undertakes by the exhibition of that evil to change the fundamental law of the land. If we were to argue in that way, where would the Constitution of the United States be? Sir, there are other evils in this country beside those that he depicts. There are other people who suffer in this country beside the colored race; there is want, destitution, almost starvation, at many a hearth-stone beside those of the colored people. There are people without hearth-stones, without homes, literally like the birds of the air and the beasts of the field, without anything to shelter their heads or their naked forms, beside the people who are of the colored race. And if we are to interpret the Constitution by pictures of suffering, of destitution, or even of wrong, and change its plain letter and extend it to meet every want or necessity that may exist in the country, then, sir, you had better abolish it at once; then, sir, the limitations of a written constitution are not worth the paper upon which they are written.

But the Senator says that I am like Rip Van Winkle, that I reason like a person of a past age. Sir, I grant I have not the facility at turning which the Senator from Indiana possesses. I grant that I am no such gymnast as he is. I grant that I do not change well-matured considerations upon every wind of popular favor. I grant that I am a little stubborn in standing by that which I have long considered and in which I firmly believe. I grant that I do not look to see how the political weather-cock blows in order to form my opinions upon the Constitution of the United States. I grant that I do not make Richmond speeches one year and say that negroes ought not to be allowed to vote, and then become their chief champion before that speech has passed out of the memory of the persons or half the persons who heard it. I grant that I do not advocate a great expansion of the currency one day and before the ink is dry with which my speeches are printed surrender to the contractionists. I grant that I am too obstinate for that, too much of a Rip Van Winkle, if you please, too much of an antediluvian, if you please, and God forbid that I should every be anything else.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio congratulates himself that he has undergone no change; that he is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; that he has learned nothing; that he is Bourbon; that the notions he had before the war and during the war he entertains to-day, all of which is a frank admission that the notions the Senator had in regard to slavery, in regard to the rebellion, in regard to the right of this Government to put down that rebellion, in regard to the rights of colored men and what should be their condition—that all these ancient notions which have been put away, which have been trampled under foot by most men, which are unworthy of the age—that all these ancient, moss-covered notions he still entertains. He admits that he has learned nothing, that he has not progressed. He has defined his own position, and I leave him to enjoy it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana cannot put words in my mouth that I did not utter; but driven into a corner he may resort to that means of getting out of it. Whenever the Senator shall call the attention of the Senate to any opinion upon any subject ever expressed by me, either in regard to the true interpretation of the Constitution, in regard to slavery, in regard to the war, in regard to any other subject upon which I have ever expressed an opinion, I will either acknowledge my error if I was in error, or defend my opinion as best I may. But he cannot by vague generality, or insinuation of that which he dare not produce, create any prejudice against me.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the question involved in the present discussion is not one that can be settled by declamation or patriotic generalities. It is a dry question of constitutional law. It is not a question of political policy. The question is not whether negroes ought to be allowed to sit upon juries, or whether white men ought to be allowed exclusively to sit upon juries, or whether any class of people ought to be excluded from juries. The question is, has the Government of the United States any power to regulate the right and authority of the States to determine who shall sit upon juries in the State courts. That is the question.

In my opinion Congress has no power to pass such a law as that provided here, and I maintain that the considerations submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] do not even tend to establish the right of the Federal Government to exercise such a power. The substance, the gist of the argument he submits is, that there is a prejudice in the minds of the white people of the South and indeed of the whole country against the black people, and if a State shall undertake to exclude the black people from sitting upon juries, therefore the black man cannot have the equal protection of the laws, he is not a citizen under the Constitution of the United States, nor is he a citizen under the constitutions of the several States. He maintains that in order to have full and free citizenship a negro must have the right to sit upon juries in the courts of the several States. That I deny.

To sit upon a jury is not a civil right, in a technical sense, any more than to hold an office is a civil right. It is not a civil right of all men under the Constitution of the United States or of the several States to hold office. The rights of life, liberty, and property, and to have these protected by law and all lawful authorities, are civil rights.

But then the Senator asks, will it be pretended if juries are composed exclusively of white men that the colored people of the South have the equal protection of the laws? I answer without hesitation, "yes." What is meant by "the equal protection of the laws" is this: That whoever administers the law through the courts or anywhere else must administer it to all people without distinction for any case, according to the constitution and laws of the State where he does administer it. It is no matter whether the officer is a white man or a black man, he is bound to administer it fairly to every man, woman, and child, of every race and color, of every condition in life; and when the law is so administered by the judge or by the jury or by the other officer, whatever kind of officer he may be, that the persons to whom he administers have the equal protection of the law in the sense of the Constitution.

The Senator puts this case: He says suppose in South Carolina, where the colored race have the majority and can control, the Legislature should see fit to pass a law providing that none but negroes should sit on the juries, would there not be a great outcry on the part of the white people? I admit that there would be a great outcry in that case, and there ought to be. I think it would be a great outrage, because the white people are the more intelligent race and they are better qualified to administer the law or power. But if the Senator asks me whether they have power to do so, I answer yes, they have such power. They have the constitutional power to do it. They have not probably the moral right to do it; but they have the constitutional power to do it. Why? Because the right to sit in the jury-box is a political right; it is of that class of rights deemed political, it is in aid of the general administration of the Government.

But suppose that every judge in South Carolina was a negro, suppose that every officer in South Carolina was a negro, every white man would have the equal protection of the laws in the contemplation of the clause of the Constitution under consideration; and why? Because every negro judge, because every negro officer in the State would be bound to administer the law protecting life, liberty, and property to the white man just as he would be bound to administer it to the negro; and if he did not do that he would be guilty of a prostitution of his office, and would be subject to impeachment under the constitution and laws of that State.

It is much more important to hold many offices than to sit upon a jury. Will the Senator from Indiana deny that if the people of the State of North Carolina should see proper to alter their constitution and provide that a black man should not hold office because he was a black man, it would be competent for them to do so. Was it not contemplated by the Constitution that such political distinction should be made by the States? It was so understood at the time the fourteenth amendment was discussed and adopted that certain political distinctions might be made, as the debates show; but without reference to the debates, the Constitution as it now stands shows that these political distinctions may be made by the States in their discretion. In every State in the South it is provided that all persons shall be upon an equality politically and civilly, but that does not imply that it is not in the power of any State in the South or elsewhere in the Union to deny political rights to any class of people it may see fit for any consideration that may commend itself to the judgment of its people. Let me turn to the fifteenth amendment upon this very subject, which impliedly sustains the position I now occupy. Article 15 is in these words:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Why did that provision stop at voting? The several States cannot prohibit anybody from voting for any one of three reasons, to wit: race, color, and previous condition of servitude; but for any other reason or cause they may prohibit a person from voting. They may prohibit men from voting because they cannot read, because they cannot write, because they do not own so much property. In some of the States to-day those who cannot read and write are not allowed to vote; and I believe in one State of the Union there is a property qualification. At any rate these distinctions are kept up; and the only point of view in which the States are restricted as to their control over the right of suffrage is the one contained in the fifteenth amendment, that men shall not be prohibited from voting on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. But with this exception, this limitation, the power that the States exercised before the adoption of this amendment remains there to this day; and the States may discriminate as to who or what classes shall hold office; and if they may discriminate in the important matter of holding office, in the office of governor, in the places of members of the Legislature, of judges, and other officers, upon what ground does the Senator from Indiana draw the distinction that they cannot make a like discrimination as to the office or place of juror? I should like him, instead of dealing in empty declamation in discussing this dry question of law, to assign causes—reasons for the position which he assumes, rather than merely state it as a naked opinion.

If he asks me whether I think it prudent to exclude the negro from sitting in the jury-box, I am ready to answer that, and I answer no. I believe it is the duty of the southern people and of the American people, inasmuch as we have established the grand doctrine of universal freedom, universal civil equality—not political equality, but civil equality—I believe that it is our duty to the colored race to do the best we can by them, to educate them, to encourage them, and to protect them everywhere, and fit them for the rights of citizenship; but it is not our duty to go crazy about them and ruin them and ourselves, too, by misleading and deceiving them and falling down and worshiping at their feet with a view to get their votes and their political influence. That is infamous hypocrisy; it is the worst sort of demagogism; it is the meanest character of statesmanship.

I am willing to do justice by that race. I want to see them educated; I want to see them elevated; I wish to see them become citizens of a high type, and competent and able to enjoy the highest and best civilization and free government; but you are not going to do it by any such policy as is indicated in the speeches I hear on this subject on this floor from day to day. The plans suggested are not practical; they are not just; they indicate a total ignorance of what is necessary to be done for the best interests of the negro race and the people of all races and the whole country. Rights are practical things; governments are practical things, and they must be upheld and sustained in a practical way and by practical means. Fancy theories will not do, and whoever thinks so is not wise.

I not only say that I think they ought to be protected, but I believe in every State in the South the constitution or laws provide that negroes shall be entitled to hold office and shall be entitled to sit on juries. I do not know that there is any distinction made in a single State of the South; I know there is no distinction made in my own State.

This, therefore, is a mere clamor, by which a particular party in this country have been able to maintain their ascendency over the negro and the country ever since the close of the late war and to secure the votes of eight hundred thousand or a million negroes. That is the secret cause of this bill and this clamor which annoys and disturbs Congress and the whole country. I maintain that this is wrong; that it is the duty of Congress to look to the best interests of the black race and the white race; and it will be time enough when the negro race are deprived of their rights in the courts to talk about taking these extreme measures for their protection.

The Senator from Indiana a few moments ago when I propounded a question to him answered in the affirmative, and in that I think he answered his whole speech. I asked him this question: Is it competent for a State Legislature to provide by law that if a negro shall be charged with the crime of murder negroes alone shall be competent to sit on the jury to try him? When I asked him that question he said yes. Then said I, if a foreigner should be charged with the crime of murder and put on his trial would it be competent in that case for the State to provide by statute that he should be tried by a jury of foreigners? He said yes. Well, if the State has power to make distinction as to nativity and country, why not power to make a like distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude? Has he pointed to any legal distinction that justifies the one case and not the other? When I ask him that question he goes off in declamation about liberty and men being behind the age, men changing their opinions, and who sympathized with the rebellion and who did not. It seems to me that is a very poor way, a very unsatisfactory way, of discussing a question like this. It argues the lack of solid reasons for the positions he assumes. I ask him for reason; he gives me declamation—platitudes about freedom. The interests of freedom require more substantial defense than this.

I maintain that Congress has no power to abridge this right of the States, and I do it because there is no limitation imposed upon the power of a State in this regard in the fourteenth or fifteenth articles of amendment or any other article of the Constitution. The substance and effect of the fourteenth article is that every citizen, and not only every citizen but every human being within the Union, within a State of the Union, shall have the equal protection of the laws. That I admit; that is true. But it is not meant by that that he shall necessarily be a juror, that he shall necessarily be a governor, that he shall be a member of the Legislature, that he shall be a member of Congress, or that he shall be President. It means that whoever administers the laws through the political instrumentalities of the Government, in administering the laws shall give him that equal protection for his life, his liberty, and property which every man is entitled to; and if the judge is a negro, he is bound because he is a judge—not because he is a negro—if I should be brought before him to be tried in the matter of my life, liberty, or property, to administer the law to me just as he would to one of his own color or any other color. That is the right view of it and no other view of it can be taken and maintained in law and reason. This, it seems to me, is the plain meaning of the Constitution upon its face. I may add that every judicial exposition of that instrument sustains this reasonable view.

If the negroes should have the ascendency in any State, if they should compose the Legislature, if they should compose the convention of the State to form the organic law, they could provide that no white man should be governor, that no white man should hold office because he is a white man. I think that would be very unwise, very impolitic, very wrong, but still they have the power under the organic law of the United States; and they have the power in the several States to make such an organic law and carry it into effect and operation, and the white man could not say that he did not have the equal protection of the law in contemplation of law because all the officers were negroes. He could justly complain, but not upon that ground. All he could ask would be that the negro judge should administer the law to him fairly and justly, and if he should allow his color or a white man's color to prejudice his judgment unjustly, he would be a false officer and would be subject to impeachment and to be degraded from office and deserve the execration of every good man.

That, it seems to me, is the whole of the matter, and therefore I say this fourth section of this bill would be unconstitutional and void if the bill shall become a law. This clause is only calculated to produce mischief of the most serious character, and in the end be declared by the courts void. It is essentially vicious, and I trust it will be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Ohio, in submitting the amendment, suggested that the question could not be taken until to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the understanding.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to know about that agreement. I understood it meant this: that a vote should be taken as early as two o'clock to-morrow, provided the debate lasted that long; but if nobody wants to speak, are we not entitled to have a vote at once and have the matter out of the way? I suppose that is the spirit of the agreement.

Mr. MERRIMON. The understanding was that the vote would not be taken earlier than two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MORTON. If persons want to speak that long.

Mr. MERRIMON. And further, that this side of the House were to have to-day to debate the bill at their pleasure, all day and all night if they pleased, and that at all events the vote would not be taken until two o'clock to-morrow. It is perfectly competent to lay this aside temporarily, to be called up at the pleasure of any one who desires to address the Senate upon it, and to consider another subject meanwhile, but it was certainly agreed that no vote should be taken until two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ALCORN. Every agreement is supposed to be based upon some reason; and when the reason ceased to exist, then as a matter of course the agreement of itself would cease. It was supposed that the Senators who are opposed to this bill desired to discuss it, and it was upon that supposition that the agreement was made. If, however, the Senators on the other side do not wish to discuss the bill, I see no reason why we should not take a vote on the bill. The reason for delay having ceased to exist, the vote as a matter of course should come. If they desire to debate it, the Senate is willing to hear that debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no power to compel Senators to debate the question. Unless some motion is made, the Chair will put the question on the amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. I know there are gentlemen who desire to debate this question.

Mr. ALCORN. If there is no person to debate it now, I move that the vote be taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I think would certainly be in violation of the understanding. I suppose we all appreciate how it is. The gentlemen on the other side have a stock of very good speeches; they are applicable to this subject, and they may be applicable to other subjects which may come before us. They had it in their power, of course, to expend them upon this bill if no time was fixed, and could have talked it into next week if they liked and felt it to be their duty to do so. Not knowing how long they wished to speak—but they of course acting for themselves—we agreed that no vote should be taken until to-morrow at two o'clock. Now, if they do not wish to occupy the time and are unwilling to modify the understanding so as to vote now, I certainly feel bound by the engagement. We lose nothing except the inability to go on and do business, arising from the fact that they stand by the letter of the contract. If they do, of course I for one have no complaint to make, because they certainly could occupy the time if they wanted, and they need not have made the agreement if they did not wish to do so. If they are willing to lay this matter aside for an hour or two and do something else, the agreement still to stand, we can perhaps take up the tax bill and go on with that.

Mr. ALCORN. I was not present when the agreement was made, and the remark I made was intended to draw out an expression of opinion about it. Do I understand that we are forbidden under the agreement to go to the consideration of other business, or are we to sit here simply to look at each other until the time arrives for the vote to be taken?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps it would not be very clear which would be the most advantageous to the public interests. We cannot undertake to decide that. Of course I did not anticipate for one that the time would not be occupied. The gentlemen upon the other side insisted upon having this much time for debate, and as I understand the agreement it so reads: "No vote shall be taken"—not even on an amendment, because Senators, knowing there was to be no vote, would wish to do something else—"until to-morrow at two o'clock," and "no business is to interpose except by general consent," so that the gentlemen on the other side could not have any just right to say that the time which they wished to occupy in speaking had been taken away from them.

I am disposed to stand by the agreement; but I am not sure, if they would not think it impolite, that I would not just as soon sit here and study papers as to sit here and listen to speeches.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Vermont is entirely right. His interpretation of the agreement which was read to the Senate last night was quoted this morning by my honorable friend from Ohio, who in offering this amendment respecting the jury clause in this bill stated distinctly that while he offered the amendment he knew that no vote could be taken upon it until to-morrow at two o'clock. That was not only the understanding, but there could be no other idea. He stated at the time that he offered the amendment for the purpose of discussion. An unavoidable accident occurred, I may say to the Senate in explanation of any delay in the debate. A gentleman who was supposed to be desirous of addressing the Senate on this subject met with some accident to his manuscript, and on that account he was delayed; and the Senator from Ohio then took occasion to offer the amendment which he would otherwise have postponed until to-morrow when the five-minute rule would be in force, as he stated at the time; and one reason why he offered it at this juncture was that the five minutes allowed to-morrow would hardly be sufficient for the proper explanation of the very important amendment which he proposed to make. The Senate heard it and in silence assented to it, and not only in silence, but it was because every one knew, as I supposed, that that was the understanding that no vote was to be taken to-day.

You see, Mr. President, this is a question of general convenience to all. If the vote upon this subject was to be delayed it did not bind Senators to remain present in the Chamber, or to keep up a quorum, or to see that the majority of the Chamber should not be out when possibly the minority might call a vote and pass a measure against the faith of the body. We all know where the majority stands; we on this side have too much cause to regret it; but at the same time, knowing the fact on our side, the arrangement was made in full view of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will permit a suggestion from the Chair, that a motion to lay aside this bill informally subject to call would allow the Senate to proceed with other business, this bill to be called up at the desire of any Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Delaware whether he would consent to have us take up the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government? Would he regard it as interfering at all with the present arrangement if we were to take up that bill and dispose of it?

Mr. MORTON. What is the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The tax and tariff bill.

Mr. NORWOOD. I was speaking on the Louisiana question some days ago and yielded to the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to take up appropriation bills. I did not mean to conclude my remarks upon that question until they should be appropriate to some measure before the Senate; but as there seems to be a lull in this debate, as the question of civil-rights involves the question of equality and equal rights and equal protection of the laws, and as I know of nothing else that is more deeply involved in the Louisiana question than this, I suppose I might as well proceed now and conclude my remarks upon the Louisiana question.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I appeal to the Senator from Georgia to allow me to take from the table a bill that has passed the House with an amendment awaiting the concurrence of the Senate. It is the bill (S. No. 420) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I object to the consideration of any other question but the one before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland. I supposed that on the other side they were not prepared to debate the pending question. This bill lies on the table. The Senator from Ohio who raised an objection to it has withdrawn that objection, and certainly there can be no opposition now to concurrence in the amendment of the House which provides for additional money to be placed in the Treasury. This bill provides for the restoration of lands in the State of Michigan, and one clause is that the residue of the land shall be sold at public sale. The amendment of the House is that it shall not be sold at a less minimum than $2.50 an acre; the present minimum being $1.25. I think therefore that the Senator from Maryland will not persist in his objection but will allow this bill to be considered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have heard the honorable Senator; but this day was assigned by agreement for the consideration of the most important bill now before us and it is important that that bill should be discussed, and properly discussed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Go ahead and discuss it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If we permit one subject to intervene, others equally important will come in. I do not know anything about the bill of the honorable Senator.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let me say one word just there. I understood from the Senator from Georgia that he was not prepared to go on with the discussion, and I appeal to him to yield to me for this purpose. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's remarks, but if he is not prepared to go on, I desire to call up this bill.

Mr. NORWOOD. I am about as well prepared as I ever shall be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. NORWOOD addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 17th instant. Having spoken two hours—

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it asked the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2502) for the relief of settlers on lands within railroad limits; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4843) to relieve James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late soldier Company F, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of desertion.

ELIZABETH WOLF.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend from Georgia give way for a moment to allow me to make a motion for the reconsideration of a vote on a pension bill?

Mr. NORWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRATT. I move for a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2794) granting a pension to Elizabeth Wolf was indefinitely postponed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Comtee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Georgia allow the Chair to present two House bills for reference?

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

The bill (H. R. No. 4843) to relieve James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late soldier Company F, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of desertion, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 2502) for the relief of settlers on lands within railroad limits was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. When that bill comes up I want to ask the Senate to put it on its passage; but I will not interfere with my friend from Georgia now against his consent. It is a bill that has the concurrence of the Public Land Committee.

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not object to this interruption at all.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Is this reported by a committee?

Mr. SARGENT. It has the concurrence of the Committee on Public Lands. If the chairman were here, he would make the same request. The bill explains itself in a single sentence. Where a settler has paid the Government two dollars and a half an acre for double-minimum lands within a railroad grant, which grant is subsequently forfeited and restored to the public domain, so that he has paid twice the price he would have paid if no railroad had been projected——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the committee approve of it, I do not object.

Mr. MERRIMON. I should like to ask the Senator from California what is the necessity for that relief?

Mr. SARGENT. The necessity is that they paid double the price for Government land under pretense that a railroad would be built, and no railroad is built and the grant is restored to the public domain. Now, instead of paying them their money back, it is provided they shall have double the land they originally took.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better stand over. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD. I will say before proceeding——

Mr. RAMSEY. I would thank the honorable Senator to allow me, while resting, to call up the post-route bill, which is not usually read, and it might be disposed of in about two minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. RAMSEY. I was in hopes the Senator from Vermont was not in. If I had known he was here I should not have made the appeal. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I can readily understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. I withdraw the request.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MERRIMON and Mr. WINDOM submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4730) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, Mr. MORTON, Mr. CLAYTON, and Mr. BOUTWELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. BAYARD. With the consent of the Senator from Georgia, I move that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr NORWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to appeal to my friend from Georgia to let us have an executive session for a few minutes; and, as he is interrupted now, perhaps he would as soon suspend here and let us have the executive session at once, as it will probably take us till about five o'clock.

Mr. NORWOOD. Very well, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands, agreed to a conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WASHINGTON TOWNSEND of Pennsylvania, Mr. JACKSON ORR of Iowa, and Mr. WILLIAM S. HERNDON of Texas, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 2765) granting a pension to John W. Darby; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and political rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORWOOD concluded his speech. His speech in full will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. BAYARD addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President——

Mr. MCCREERY. If the Senator from Maryland will yield the floor, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will give way for that motion, as I intend to address the Senate to-morrow upon this bill.

Mr. MCCREERY. I submit the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1875.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. J. W. CHICKERING, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

The Clerk commenced to read the Journal of Wednesday last.

Mr. STORM, (interrupting.) I raise the point of order that the Clerk has not read the names of the persons voting in the negative and in the affirmative on the several votes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on their being read?

Mr. STORM. I do.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HURLBUT, (interrupting.) I propose to offer for the consideration of the House a proposition, which, if adopted by unanimous consent, I think will be satisfactory to all parties. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the proposition which the Clerk will now read be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal is waived, and the Committee on Appropriations shall have this day until five o'clock p. m. for the consideration of the sundry civil bill, and a recess be taken from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock, at which last hour House bill No. 4745, shall be taken up for debate only, the previous question to be called on the same when ordered by the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules, so as to adopt that proposition.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to make this suggestion: that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at one o'clock on the following day.

Mr. ATKINS. I insist that the House shall come to order; it is impossible for any one to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. To restore order, the first thing is for members to resume their seats.

Mr. ATKINS. If they will do that, then everybody can hear what is going on.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to change his resolution so as to make it read "the sundry civil appropriation bill, and other appropriation bills."

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot get through with the sundry civil bill before five o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. But we may want to send the Indian appropriation bill to a conference committee, and other small bills.

Mr. RANDALL. My judgment is that the sundry civil bill will take the whole day.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I do not object to going on with the appropriation bills or to taking a recess, but I claim the right and do desire to move to suspend the rules, as I think I have a right to do, to set aside the hearing of the bill now about to be taken up; I do not desire to waive that right.

Mr. RANDALL. Any right the gentleman may have of that kind will not be interferred with by this agreement.

Mr. HURLBUT. This must either be done by unanimous consent or not by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT?]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object.

Mr. COBURN. I would like to say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] objects to the proposition. There is no need of discussing it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move then to suspend the rules and adopt the proposition which has been read.

Mr. COBURN. What I want to say is this: I do not propose to call the previous question at any time during the session of to-night, but I expect to call it at an early hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] is not before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and adopt that order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Can the reading of the Journal be interrupted for this purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is competent for the House to suspend the reading of the Journal and at the same time make an order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My inquiry is whether this motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] can come in to the interruption of the reading of the Journal. I do not object. I only want the ruling of the Chair as to whether we can interrupt the Journal to make an order of that kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know whether there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] objects.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] will withdraw that objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the gentleman from Texas to object to the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] not to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a question of order. I cannot hear anything that is going on.

The SPEAKER. Nor can the Chair.

Mr. CESSNA. Is it not in order for me to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to modify his proposition, so as to say "appropriation bills" instead of "the sundry civil appropriation bill?"

The SPEAKER. That is not of the slightest practical consequence.

Mr. CESSNA. I presumed I had the right to make the inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. COX. If we had order this thing could be arranged amicably.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not submit any proposition till there is order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SENER. I move to reconsider the action just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I wish now to make a statement in relation to calling the previous question. I propose to-morrow at one o'clock, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to call the previous question.

Mr. COX. You cannot get consent to that.

Mr. COBURN. I only give this notice. I do not undertake to bind anybody by the announcement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

C. D. ANDERSON.

On motion of Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 679) to relieve C. D. Anderson, of Travis County, Texas, of political disabilities was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVIDENCE IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. TODD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in contested elections be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

There being no objection, the amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant.

Mr. TODD. I move concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. CESSNA. I have an amendment authorized by the Judiciary Committee of the House which I desire to submit as an amendment to this amendment.

Mr. TODD. I decline to yield for that purpose.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. TODD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM M. KIMBALL.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to William M. Kimball the full pay and emoluments of a lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Eleventh Minnesota Volunteers, from October 10, 1862, to May 8, 1863; and a sum sufficient to pay the same is appropriated.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY TO TERRITORIAL RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments (disagreed to by the Senate) to the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands; and that a conference with the Senate be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to reconsider the action just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM J. PATTON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Claims for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 459, for the relief of William J. Patton.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objection will be in order.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in the settlement of the accounts of William J. Patton, late collector of the first and second districts of Arkansas, to audit and allow such amounts as are shown to have been stolen or embezzled by his late deputy collectors, Henry C. Brown, William Hoffman, Andrew J. L. Barker, John T. Fleming, and John A. Geohegan, it first being proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such embezzlements or larceny did not occur through any fault or negligence of said Patton; provided that in case any of the money so stolen or embezzled shall hereafter be recovered, the same shall inure to the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object to that bill.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. THOMPSON said: I withdraw my objection to Senate bill No. 459. I was not aware at the time I made the objection of all the features of the bill.

No further objection being made, the bill was received, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 1251) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask unanimous consent that the bills for the admission of Colorado and New Mexico as States of the Union, just returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, the amendments non-concurred in, and a committee on conference asked.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SPEER objected.

J. C. M'BURNEY.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Claims, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1026 a bill (H. R. No. 4842) for the relief of J. C. McBurney, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Georgia, with a recommendation that it pass.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The substitute directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to J. C. McBurney, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Georgia, the sum of $3,859.07 on account of embezzlement and defalcation of Michael O'Brien, acting as deputy to said McBurney.

No objection was made, and the substitute was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments, House bill No. 2502, for the relief of settlers on land within railroad limits, and that the same be passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill as proposed to be amended will be read.

The amended bill provides that where any actual settler shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double minimum rates, and such railroad lands having been forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate, on any unoccupied lands, an amount equal to their original entry, without further cost, except such fees as are now provided by law in pre-emption cases; provided, that when such location is upon double minimum lands, one-half the amount only shall be taken.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This bill has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands. It is a fair and just bill to the settlers who may have been deprived of the benefits of a railroad by the abandonment of the line of road, and the land has reverted back to the United States.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was passed.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES A. HILE.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed at this time a bill to relieve James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late a soldier of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of desertion.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to issue to James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late a soldier of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Missouri Infantry Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the service, and to so amend the records and muster-rolls of the War Department as to show that he is no deserter, and that said Hile be entitled to pay and bounty as other soldiers of his rank and arm of service, deducting the time of his absence.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4843) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why cannot gentlemen take their seats and ask from their seats for unanimous consent? The Speaker, by starting from one side of the House and going around the Hall, can give all a fair chance. Let it be understood that there will be opportunity given for having all things considered that do not take much time.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is right here in front where he can get the Speaker's eye at any moment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can; but I want the rest to have a chance.

Mr. CONGER. The rest of us here on the back seats cannot do as well.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am in favor of the back seats now.

M'CRARY'S LAW OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Elections a resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to procure from the publisher thereof five hundred copies of the Law of Elections, by Hon. G. W. McCRARY, for the use of the House, to be kept for that purpose, at a cost not to exceed five dollars per volume, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. STORM. I object.

PAY OF MEMBERS DURING THE RECESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 4556) to amend an act to remove a restriction upon the right of Representatives-elect to receive their pay during the recess of Congress.

The bill, which was read, provides that so much of section 38 of the Revised Statutes as requires the Clerk of the House of Representatives to omit from the pay-roll of Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress those holders of proper certificates whose election he may be notified will be contested be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. COX. I object to that bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask the gentleman from New York to hear a single word before he insists upon his objection. This restriction accomplishes no good purpose, while it is a serious annoyance not only to the Representatives themselves, but to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. McNULTA. I object to debate.

Mr. COX. I have objected to that bill before. How do we know who is elected to Congress? Why should we act upon a simple certificate of the Clerk?

Mr. CESSNA. Members take their seats upon a certificate sent to the Clerk.

Mr. COX. But suppose members should afterward be turned out of Congress?

Mr. CESSNA. This restriction does not save a single cent to the contingent fund of the House. The member who comes with a certificate and takes his seat and on that certificate is sworn in, and immediately afterward goes to the Sergeant-at-Arms and draws his pay. It is only a source of embarrassment to the Clerk. While to pass this bill will be the means of affording accommodation to a great many people, at the same time it will do no harm to the Government. To allow the restriction to remain upon the statute-book only induces a great many who have warm contests to serve notice upon their opponents who have been more successful.

Mr. COX. Suppose it should be determined that the member was not elected?

Mr. CESSNA. That would not matter, because under the present law as soon as Congress meets the holder of the certificate would be sworn in, and as I have already said will draw his pay immediately from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. McNULTA. I must object to debate.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only hearing unanimous consents.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my objection, as I have misapprehended the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR and Mr. CALDWELL objected.

JICARILLA APACHES.

Mr. McNULTA. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs and put on its passage a bill for the ratification of an agreement with the Jicarilla Apache Indians.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In order to save time I object to the bill. There is therefore no necessity to read it further.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McNULTA. I object to everything out of the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask to report various bills to have them printed.

Mr. McNULTA. I object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, by unanimous consent, that the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Pending that motion I move that by unanimous consent all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be closed on the pending paragraph when its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. COX. I hope not. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] has an amendment to offer and he wants some time to explain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will make it five minutes; that all debate shall be closed in five minutes on the pending paragraph.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to demand the enforcement of the rule in reference to admission on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will enforce the rule.

Mr. KASSON. I regret to take even one minute of the time of the House and shall hardly take more than one, to say that on the 23d of February the Chicago Tribune, as I learned for the first time this morning, published me as having voted ay to take up the Southern Pacific Railroad subsidy bill, so called. On the 24th the editor of that paper justly expressed great surprise that "KASSON, of Iowa, should be found voting in that way." I am equally surprised that the editor of the paper should have supposed it possible that "KASSON of Iowa" ever did vote that way, although the columns of his own paper indicate it; but while he was justified by the report sent from Washington, still on an examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD his error would have been made apparent and he would have found me recorded, then as always on such subjects, in the negative, and as one of three gentlemen who demanded the yeas and nays promptly in order that the sense of the House might be fully taken.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to statements of this sort being made in the House, because many of us who have been misrepresented in that way when we do not rise to correct the misrepresentations will be held responsible for not doing it.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say, thanking the House for its courtesy and regretting that the gentleman from Tennessee does not see the importance of these matters being set right—I have only to say that it is an entire error, and hope the reporters of that paper, who are usually very accurate, will have it corrected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question being put on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. It was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole I ask unanimous consent to have an hour assigned to-morrow evening for reports from the Committee on Military Affairs, which has quite a large number of reports to make. Last night was assigned to that committee, but it was deprived of it in consequence of the adjournment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I object.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, debate on the pending amendment is limited to five minutes. The Clerk will read the paragraph which was pending when the committee rose.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection of mining and mineral statistics, under charge of Professor Rossiter W. Raymond, the amount to be immediately available, to be expended and to be for the completion of the work, $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$15,000" and insert "$10,000."

Mr. COX. The amendment had been voted down and a division was called for, when the committee rose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$11,000."

I do so for the purpose of obtaining information upon a question which it seems to me is worthy of a little thought. I understood from the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the other day that this was the close of Professor Raymond's work in regard to the collection of mining statistics. It seems to me, with a very slight and imperfect knowledge of the subject I admit, that the mining statistics of the country are of very great importance; that we should have a current series of them published for the information of the country. We ought not to depend, it seems to me, on an appropriation to some individual, however accomplished and distinguished he may be; but the collection of them should appertain properly to some Department of the Government. I would suggest that it might very properly come in under the direction of the Bureau of coinage, under the direction of Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint. At any rate let it be placed in the charge of some man whose duty it should be to keep up the current series of statistics and publish them as a part of his official conduct, so as not to leave the matter to be provided for by an occasional appropriation by Congress. I merely throw out the suggestion in order to hear what may be said

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me a moment of his time?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee are all in the direction of encouraging the gathering of these statistics; only he wants to go further than the Committee on Appropriations felt justified in going in building up a new division or Bureau. I would have no objection to that being done after due deliberation and examination, and I believe with the gentleman that this is of importance enough to make it a permanent feature. But this appropriation the gentleman will see is in the line of completing a begun work. So far as Professor Raymond is concerned he does not ask to be quartered upon the Government as a permanent official, only that this work in which he has been so enthusiastic and to which he has given much labor, and I believe genius, shall be completed; so that when it is finished he may feel that his work is done.

If Congress should see fit to establish a division under the Bureau of the Mint for this purpose, I believe it would be a good endeavor; and I hope that the House will not on any suggestion of that kind cut down this appropriation. I may remark also that I understood that on the last day when we were considering this bill the committee had voted and had negatived the amendment. Perhaps I am wrong.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman that $15,000 would furnish us with a great deal of official work; it would pay the salaries of a great number of officers.

Mr. COX. The five minutes allowed for debate when we went into committee were intended for my friend from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who wishes to move to cut down the appropriation to $7,000. I would be willing to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, and if it were adopted, to place the appropriation in the hands of some Department or officer of the Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not insist on my amendment. I withdraw it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$7,000."

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. The time allowed for debate has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph was limited to five minutes, and that time has now expired.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not wish to detain the committee more than one moment. In the early part of the session the Director of the Mint, one of the best officers in our Government, offered to do this work for $7,000 per annum. I believe he is one of the best qualified officers in the Government, and he is willing to do the work for half the amount that Professor Raymond does it for.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending paragraph is exhausted.

The question being taken on Mr. LUTTRELL'S amendment to the amendment there were ayes 33, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$10,000."

Mr. McCORMICK. Is that debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The time allowed for debate has been exhausted.

Mr. McCORMICK. Gentlemen should understand that if they strike at this appropriation they strike at the only appropriation for gathering statistics of the value and development of our great mineral resources, and prevent the completion, at a comparatively trifling outlay, of a very important work by a very competent and faithful man.

The question being taken on the amendment there were ayes 43, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completion of the jail in the District of Columbia, in accordance with the plans and specifications therefor, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $140,057.93.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to strike out from line 215 to line 226 inclusive. There is no other expenditure of the people's money to be made in this District less likely to be complained of by tax-payers, perhaps, than this provision to finish a jail here with $29,900 for heating-apparatus. But the District of Columbia has already one jail, which has never been filled as perhaps it ought to have been.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman wants to discuss that, he must wait until the paragraph is reached.

Mr. MERRIAM. I want at least to inquire why the Government of the United States is expending here $185,548.93 for the completion of a new jail. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee for an explanation why so much money is now to be expended on a jail for this city when every other city in the Union provides for its own jail. It is true that this Congress has rented two cells during the sitting of the Ways and Means for Pacific mail witnesses, but what the country has gained from their incarceration does not seem to warrant a full-fledged, highly ornamented and fiercely heated residence for fancy convicts.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that it will be utterly impossible to get through with this bill until two things happen: a reasonably fair attention to business on the part of the committee, and unless gentlemen vote, so that we can make a quorum and not be driven to the constant necessity of expending many minutes in getting a quorum present.

In regard to this question, Congress authorized some years ago the building of a jail for this District. Many persons convicted in this District under the United States laws are now sent to Albany and to other distant points, and it seemed that a jail large enough to keep all the persons convicted here ought to be made. There was a special act passed authorizing the building of a jail. The estimate for that jail was made on the 4th of June, 1874, at $490,057.93, together with an estimate of $10,000 for fencing and inclosures. There has already been expended $350,000. The amount asked for in this appropriation was given in full in the estimates sent by the Secretary of the Interior, whose letter on the subject is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter, dated November 12, 1874, from Mr. A. B. Mullett, late Supervising Architect of the Treasury, submitting estimates of appropriations required for the completion of the new jail in the District of Columbia, in accordance with the plans and specifications therefor, amounting in all to the sum of $185,548.93.

It will be perceived from Mr. Mullett's letter that the total estimated cost to complete jail, according to his former report of June 4, 1874, will be $490,057.93; that there will be required for fencing and inclosures the sum of $9,900; for heating-apparatus, $29,900; and for kitchen-utensils, washing-apparatus, and driving-engine, $5,690; in all, a total estimated cost of $535,548.93; deducting from which amount the appropriation of $300,000 made by the act approved June 1, 1872, and that of $50,000 made for continuing the work on the jail by the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 23, 1874, in all $350,000, leaves the sum of $185,548.93 to be appropriated. A copy of the report of the architect of June 4 last, referred to, is herewith, and I also have the honor to submit, for consideration by Congress, separate estimates for the several sums named in his letter of November 12 last.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

I think it is important that we should complete this building during the coming fiscal year, and therefore that we should appropriate the whole amount now necessary for its completion, and therefore the committee propose to appropriate the whole amount now necessary for its completion. When the bill was passed authorizing the building of this jail on the estimates then presented was the proper time to oppose the bill and say that it ought not to be passed. That estimate was made on the 4th of June, 1874, a year ago next June.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. When was the law passed authorizing the erection of this jail?

Mr. GARFIELD. The act was passed on the 23d of June, 1874, and nineteen days after an estimate was sent into Congress upon which the act was passed. The Committee on Appropriations had nothing to do with the passage of the act, but only with the carrying out of the provisions of the law.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserved points of order on this bill, and I make the point of order that this paragraph changes the existing law in that it permits this money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The law required that it should be expended under the direction of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this District and the Secretary of the Interior, but I suggest to the gentleman that the point of order will be waived by striking out the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to striking out those words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must request the committee to come to order. It is impossible for the Chair to preserve order without the individual assistance of the members of the committee. It is impossible for the reporters even to hear the remarks of gentlemen. The Chair appeals to members of the committee to aid the Chairman in preserving order, so that business can proceed intelligently. The Chair understands that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations desires unanimous consent to amend the pending paragraph so as to strike out the words upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the point of order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is it not too late for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to raise that question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserved the right to raise the point of order. Is there objection to modifying the pending paragraph by striking out the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior?" The Chair hears none and the modification will be made.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Before the question is taken on striking out the paragraph I move to further amend it by adding the following:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available until the present Supervising Architect of the Treasury shall have examined and approved the plan upon which said jail is being constructed, and such modifications may be made by him as he may deem necessary for the prudent and economical completion of said jail.

I wish merely to say this: I am informed that the construction of the new jail is being carried on in a very extravagant manner. According to the plan which has been adopted they are putting most elaborate marble and stone cornices on the building with all sorts of flum-a-diddle, and a great deal of expense would be avoided and a great deal of money saved to the people in the completion of that work if it can be constructed in accordance with the uses to which it is to be applied. I may be misinformed about this, and if I am my amendment will do no harm; if I am not misinformed about it, we may be able to save some money by it. I will modify my amendment by striking out the word "present" before "Supervising Architect."

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope this amendment will not be insisted upon by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.] Ever since I have been in Congress, and for years before, the debtors' jail of this District was an utter disgrace to the civilization of our country. Any number of attempts have been made and failed to improve it. We are now in the neighborhood of success; that is, we can see a way to it. The amendment of the gentleman will simply bring another element of difficulty in the way. The present plan, of which I know nothing, for I have never examined it, has received the approbation, as the law requires, of the heads of the several Departments that are called upon by law to examine and approve both the plan and the work. I submit that we had better let this go on and be completed, as it will be under the present appropriation as I am informed. Just as sure as we again open the question we shall have another scheme or plan of building, another set of bills to pay, even if we do not have the whole building pulled down and another one built. I trust after the experience we have had during the last twenty years that we shall be allowed to go on with this work and have a jail which our people will not be ashamed of when the representatives of foreign countries come here and see it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. What is the use of a lion's head and all that sort of thing on the cornice of a jail away out where nobody can see it, and I presume nobody wants to see it?

Mr. TYNER. I move to strike out $40,000 and insert $50,000, for the purpose of inquiring of my colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Indiana] if he has had any conversation with the present Supervising Architect that induces him to propose the amendment he has proposed?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Not a word. I never saw the present Supervising Architect in my life.

Mr. TYNER. Having learned that fact, I beg leave to say to my colleague that the appropriation proposed by this bill for the purposes of the new jail was inserted at the suggestion of the present Supervising Architect, who appeared in person before the Committee on Appropriations and made the statement to the committee that the amounts named in this bill would be sufficient to entirely complete the work.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Now let me ask my colleague [Mr. TYNER] a question. Did the present Supervising Architect say that this appropriation was necessary for the proper completion of the building or did he say that it was necessary to carry out the plan of his predecessor?

Mr. TYNER. I reply to that by saying that I do not know of any member of the committee putting a question to him or making any suggestion to him that would require any response of that kind. But I do know that the Supervising Architect came before the committee and suggested that this amount was necessary to complete the jail.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. TYNER. Another thing; the jail is so nearly completed, that a change of the plans and specification instead of saving money would in all probability make it necessary to spend more money.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Has the cornice been put on this jail?

Mr. TYNER. It has not.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Has it been prepared to be put on?

Mr. TYNER. I understand that a portion of the work for that purpose has been done. Whether it is an elaborate cornice with lions' heads and dragons and all that sort of thing on it, as my colleague suggests, I am unable to say. I will say, however, that it is a very respectable building, as my colleague will discover by going down on the classic banks of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac and looking at the building itself.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If this thing is all right, the adoption of my amendment will not hurt it a particle. But if there is any opportunity there to save money without impairing the usefulness of this structure, my amendment will give the opportunity and will not interfere with the proper completion of the building at all.

Mr. TYNER. I respond to that by saying that the stone out of which this cornice is in part to be constructed is already on the ground, or at least a portion of it. I will remark also that there is no sense whatever in coming into this House and suggesting that because the late Supervising Architect of the Treasury had something to do with a piece of the work therefore, and without further proof it is necessary to change it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. TYNER. But my colleague's amendment seems to indicate that much. I say that in the absence of anything in the shape of information possessed by my colleague or any other gentleman in the House that this work has been done extravagantly or in any other respect as it should not have been, it is useless for this Committee of the Whole to append to this bill a proviso of the kind proposed, especially as the identical officer suggested in the proposition is the one who came before the Committee on Appropriations and said that the amount named therein was necessary to complete the work.

Mr. MERRIAM. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to add an amendment providing that the material shall be furnished by the lowest responsible bidder, after advertisement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we ought not to do that. If we were now passing the original act for the construction of the jail, such a provision might be proper.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. There is plenty of material there now.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fencing and inclosures around said jail, $9,900.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. The appropriations in this bill would seem to indicate a very full Treasury. There are many appropriations here which, in my judgment, ought either to be struck out or reduced. The bill appropriates a large amount of money. The indications are, Mr. Chairman, that the tax bill which has been passed by the House will fail to become a law; and during the coming year we shall find our Treasury in a very straightened condition. I believe, therefore, that it is the duty of the House, in acting upon this bill, to strike out and to cut down wherever it is possible.

Here is an appropriation for fencing. Now, if this jail be built during the coming year, it will not run away; it will not be lost. There is no call for an appropriation of $10,000 at the present time for fencing around this jail. The appropriation made for the jail itself will secure its erection; but this fencing is merely a matter of ornament, merely a matter of taste. The jail will not be completed until the end of the year; and there is no necessity for expending money at the present time for fencing. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to striking out these two lines.

I insist that the passage of this bill will be facilitated by striking out these evidently unnecessary items and confining our appropriations to such objects as are absolutely necessary. The bill contains items for appropriations of very large amounts in and around the city of Washington. I never belonged to the number of those who have found fault with Washington City. But wherever we may reduce these current expenses, for which provision has been made somewhat, as the gentleman from New York has suggested, because of custom, let the appropriations be struck out. When we have more money in the Treasury, it will be time enough to incur these expenses, if it should be necessary to do so. I hope there will be no objection to striking out this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no use of mincing matters. If we are going to finish this jail, which has been authorized by law, with its fencing and inclosure, so as to dismiss the subject, and not have a long series of dribbling appropriations coming in hereafter, let us take the Secretary of the Interior and the Supervising Architect at their word when they say that just these sums in dollars and cents will complete it. It is far more economical to make the whole appropriation now in this way than to give at this time a part and let other appropriations dribble in hereafter.

The amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was not agreed to; there being ayes 19, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For heating-apparatus, $29,900.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by adding to this clause the words "to be furnished by the lowest responsible bidder, after advertisement."

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know but the apparatus may have been already obtained or at least contracted for.

Mr. RANDALL. If that should prove to be so, the amendment can be struck out hereafter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to insist on this amendment, as the work is now so nearly done.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not the slightest concealment about this matter, and I will say that my object is this: that all persons in this city who can furnish heating-apparatus shall have an opportunity to bid for this work, and that the work shall be given to the lowest possible bidder. By this we reach two results: In the first place, we throw the matter open to competition; and in addition to that we secure for the Government the doing of the work at the lowest price.

Mr. TYNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he add to his amendment these words:

Provided, That it does not interfere with existing contracts.

I do not know that there is any contract.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly; I agree to that as a modification.

Mr. GARFIELD. In that form there is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For kitchen utensils, wash-room apparatus, and driving engine, $5,691.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend this clause by adding the same amendment which has been added to the clause last under consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. We had better not do that in so small a matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it is a matter of more than $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this clause will be amended by adding to it the same provision that was appended to the previous clause.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the inquiry into the causes of the decrease of food-fishes of the coast and of the lakes of the United States, $5,000.

Mr. POTTER. I move to strike out that paragraph; and I do so to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations some reason for the appropriations in this and in the next two paragraphs by which something over $50,000 are appropriated for continuing the inquiry into the causes of the decrease of food-fishes on the coast and in the lakes of the United States, and for the propagation of food-fishes in the waters of the Pacific, the Gulf States, and of the Mississippi Valley. It seems to me a very extraordinary proceeding for the United States to go into the business of stocking the rivers and lakes throughout the country with the various kinds of food-fishes.

A gentleman on my right says the Government of the United States should do it. I know there are some gentlemen who hold to the opinion that the Government of the United States should do everything, manage everything, and supply everything, and leave nobody to take care of himself. I am inclined to believe, however, that it would be best to leave the people of the States to regulate their own affairs in this as well as other matters. As at present advised I shall vote to strike out these paragraphs.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not take up the time of the committee with discussing this question of the introduction of food-fishes along the coast and in the rivers and lakes of the United States. It has been fully discussed before. The gentleman from New York will see, I think, that his constitutional scruples about the United States Government taking care of things not legitimately belonging to it have no application in this case at all. The control of the States stops at tide-water and the regulation in reference to the introduction of food-fishes along the coasts of the United States and in the rivers running through whole tiers of States is a question which we have the right to handle. This appropriation has been made for a series of years, and I believe by the general consent of all who have examined into the matter it is an appropriation which has given more valuable returns both in the way of knowledge to the people on this subject and in the increase of our stock of food-fishes than perhaps anything appropriated in this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out I desire to move as an amendment in the way of perfecting the section to insert after the word "coast," in line 246, the words "of the rivers;" so it will read: "for continuing the inquiry into the causes of the decrease of food-fishes of the coast, of the rivers, and of the lakes of the United States, $5,000." I hope the gentleman having charge of the bill will accept my amendment. If so I will not stop to debate the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this whole fish business is a very singular one for the United States to engage in. My understanding is that it is the accepted theory about these food-fishes that when planted in a stream they always go back to the place from which they started. That being so, there is no difficulty in any locality or upon any stream of the United States for the people living there to establish a system of fish propagation for themselves. A good many States have already established a system for the introduction of food-fishes. We have such a system in Ohio. It therefore strikes me to be better to leave this matter to the States than to establish fish commissioners for the United States. I see no necessity for this being done by the General Government when people anywhere throughout the United States, in any portion of the country, can introduce into their streams exactly the fish they desire.

Mr. MAYNARD. But take such rivers as the Mississippi, running through several States, no one State government can make regulations covering the whole of them.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. If you plant shad in any little stream within the confines of any State, take for instance the Tennessee River, and the theory is if you plant shad there they will come back to that stream every year.

Mr. MAYNARD. But there are other kinds of food-fishes the introduction of which is desired in the great rivers of the country.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. If you plant shad in the Tennessee River they will always be found in that river. They will pass out into the Mississippi, and so on down into the Gulf, and they will be caught all along on their way back. So it is with other fishes.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think members fully understand the importance of the measure now under discussion. Take for instance the paragraph which the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] moves to strike out. You have the advantage during the whole warm season of the labors of over twenty scientists for this small amount of $5,000. Not one of that corps of scientific gentlemen receives a single dollar for the services which he renders. The whole $5,000 dollars is paid for an artist and a secretary and other necessary expenses. Not one dollar does any man of those twenty scientists get. Their services are given gratuitously in behalf of the cause of science.

In regard to the next paragraph, I do not believe gentlemen in this House know what has been effected. In 1867 the great Connecticut River ran dry of shad; none could be had, and none were in the river. Seth Green (and he will be always remembered by the people there) in 1867 planted 2,500,000 young shad in that river, and in 1870 the river was stocked with that fish. It takes three years for them to grow. In 1873 you could buy shad on the Connecticut River (and they are the best in the country) for three dollars a hundred. Seth Green did this alone and unaided for the Connecticut River. Now, sir, this commission has scattered the young fry of shad all over the country. It has stocked all the rivers of the country with shad, and in less than three years from to-day there will not be a single river in the country, not even the great Mississippi River running into the ocean, which will not furnish the people all up and down its banks with this nice fish, the shad. They have gone out all over the country scattering these young fish.

Now, take salmon; why they have gone last year to the Colorado, to the rivers of California, and have gathered up seven millions of eggs, hatched those eggs and scattered those salmon all over the southern portion of the country. Those rivers being warmer, these salmon grow large, to a weight of from twenty to fifty pounds. They grow quick in the southern waters. Five years ago we paid forty dollars a thousand for salmon eggs, and you have got over eight millions last year, which have been hatched and put into the various waters. I believe, as the chairman of the committee has said, that no appropriation you make has the superabundant returns this appropriation has. It has been a pet of mine, the only pet I have had since I have been in Congress. Ever since I have been here I have nursed it. I love it, and I trust the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SMITH,] who is so fierce a free-trader, does not really oppose this because he thinks protection for fishes has something to do with the tariff.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to strike out the paragraph, and was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For the introduction of shad into the waters of the Pacific States, the Gulf States, and of the Mississippi Valley, and of salmon, white fish, and other useful food-fishes, into the waters of the United States to which they are best adapted, $47,500, to be expended under the direction of the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$47,500" and insert "$17,500."

We appropriated last year $17,500 for this purpose. I am not myself against a proper expenditure of money in this direction, but I want to have only the same amount this year as was appropriated last year. By this we would save $30,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. I rise to oppose the amendment. My colleague [Mr. POTTER] took exceptions to my remark, "that the restocking of our rivers—exhausted of fish by man's improvidence and lack of consideration for those who came after us—would be productive of vast blessings to mankind." A government that watches over the economies of life will be applauded by generous men everywhere. Through the intelligent labors of a few patriotic men, our depleted rivers teem again with new life, thousands of our race are thereby furnished with the cheapest and best of food, whole families through it are saved the humiliation of beggary, and we the support of paupers The moral influence upon mankind produced when following rivers leading through the varied and beautiful scenery of our land, is so marked and it so elevates and purifies the minds and hearts of men, that any reasonable expenditure of money in that direction is both economy and wisdom.

The names of Roosevelt, Green, Professor Baird and others, to whom the country is indebted for their unselfish work, will be a pleasant memory.

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For engraving and printing certificates of centennial stock for the international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia in the year 1876, $30,750: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be construed as in any manner committing the Government of the United States to any other payment whatever to meet the expenses of said exhibition.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move to strike out that paragraph.

The motion to strike out the paragraph was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the fourteen crippled and disabled soldiers now in the employment of the Doorkeeper of the House, from April 1, 1875, to December 6, 1875, the sum of $12,549.60; which is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offer the following amendment to come in after the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 272 insert as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay Isaac Strohm for the time employed in making out the warrants for bringing, by order of the House, persons before its bar, and other papers requiring the seal of the House of Representatives, $150 per annum; and a sum sufficient for that purpose is hereby appropriated and added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe there is no objection to this appropriation for the payment of a very worthy official of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. There can be no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to cause to be erected, in the Congressional Cemetery, monuments in memory of those Representatives who have died since the erection of those last authorized; said monuments to be of uniform size and style with those previously erected, and to be contracted for by him with the lowest responsible bidder therefor, after due public notice, $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "be," in line 282, insert "of marble."

Most of those monuments, according to my recollection, are of a very indifferent kind of sandstone, which will disintegrate and perish in a short time. I think the monument ought to be of some more durable material.

Mr. MERRIAM. I would suggest the addition of the words "of granite."

Mr. MAYNARD. I accept that, and modify my amendment accordingly.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 286, insert as follows:

That the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution is authorized to purchase for the use of the United States the Catlin collection of paintings and museum of curiosities at such price as can be agreed upon, not to exceed, however, the sum of $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to postpone moving that until we reach the miscellaneous items.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Very well.

The Clerk read the following paragraph.

For the purchase of a noiseless steam-pump for the heating and ventilating department of the House of Representatives, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move to strike out that paragraph, and I do it for the purpose of making an inquiry. I have an indistinct recollection that toward the close of the last session a resolution was adopted directing certain inquiries to be made concerning the lighting and ventilating of this Hall. I desire to know if that resolution passed. I certainly hope some action may be taken in that direction. I venture to say, deliberately, that this Hall is the most conspicuous failure in the United States; and so far as my limited observation extends, in any country, as to ventilation, lighting, comfort, and health. I invite gentlemen to go into any manufacturing establishment in my State where a large number of men are employed, and I affirm that they can find no room containing so many workmen, confined so long a time, which is not better lighted and better ventilated than this Hall. Through the registers, running just behind the feet of every member, come streams of air whose temperature is sometimes as low as fifty, or sixty, or certainly from five to fifteen degrees lower than the average temperature in which our heads move, which the various thermometers show to range from 72 to 80, especially when the fierce heat of the gas-lights beats down on our heads. The rapid change of the volume makes even hot air feel cold. All the light we get in the day-time comes perpendicularly through ground-glass skylights, throwing strong lights and the deepest shadows, that strain all the nerves of the eye in the attempt to distinguish faces at a short distance. We get no direct supplies of light or air. Every principle of wholesome lighting and heating is defied, and so we go on year after year. I have no doubt that the untimely deaths of many honorable members have been due to our defiance here of all the laws of health.

Mr. MAYNARD. I oppose the amendment for the purpose of saying that I have been in this Hall from the time when the House first moved into it from the other Hall, and my experience is the reverse of that of the gentleman from Connecticut. It is to my mind the most successful room ever occupied for legislative purposes as regards heat or light or air, making it suitable for public business. I have never been conscious while occupying this room of either heat or cold, light or darkness, excess or absence of ventilation; and I take this opportunity to have on record my estimate of the character of this room, in reply to general criticisms that from time to time have been made upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move to strike out the last word, and I desire to do it because my experience has been so exactly the reverse of that of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it. I desire to say that my experience has been precisely opposite to that of the gentleman from Tennessee. The construction of this Hall is the worst fitted for the purposes for which it is used, in my judgment, of any place on the face of the earth. It is said that the court of Areopagus sat in darkness in order that they might not be influenced by the gestures of the speaker. We have improved on that. We have built a place where we can see the orator and his gesture, but as a rule cannot hear a word he says.

Mr. GARFIELD. That was the theory of Roscius.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, I have as reasonably strong lungs as anybody in this Hall, and I cannot be heard this minute distinctly by more than one third in it, and this fact gives this body an unfair and unjust reputation. We are called a very disorderly body, and it is said that we do not attend to the current business; that members will not attend to what is going on. These cross-bars here above us catch the waves of sound and prevent the voice from being heard, and then these immense galleries, with their stairways, tend in the very same direction.

Then we get none of the air of heaven in here unless it is pumped up through tubes that are not kept clean, but are reeking with all the filth that falls into them. We get none of the light of heaven except as it comes to us through the glass above.

Mr. MAYNARD. At least there is no reverberation in this Hall; no echo.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I know there is no reverberation in the Hall, because you cannot get any sound through it; that is what I am complaining of. You cannot get a reverberation until you get sound to traverse space and come back.

Sir, reverberation helps the voice. I know of no place like this in the world excepting one. I undertook to make a speech in the court-house of a town in Indiana, a room say eighty feet by sixty, and although I may say I have voice enough to reach five thousand people in the open air, yet I could not be heard in that court-house for the reason that the architect had run large pine-board arches of the Gothic pattern clear across it, which stopped the voice and prevented it being heard.

Sir, this Hall will never be fit for legislative purposes, in my judgment, until it is carried back upon each side so as to allow the light and air of heaven to enter into it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Did the gentleman ever listen to speaking in the old Hall?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I never did; but because that was bad, that is no reason why this should be made worse. I call the attention of every man here to this matter. It is of no consequence to me in the future and has not been very much in the past. Men who have been accustomed to the noisome air of crowded court-houses all their lives may be able to live here; but men who have not been so accustomed cannot live here. A larger percentage of the members of this House of Representatives die than of any other body of men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will have a vote now.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman, who has occupied as much time as anybody in this House, will not object to my occupying a little, when it is so seldom I take any time for speaking here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I will give the gentleman my time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I know it is very much the fashion of gentlemen occupying this Hall to decry its capacity for the purpose for which it was designed. I do not agree with the estimation held of it by the gentleman who has just addressed us. On the contrary, every gentleman who occupies a seat here can satisfy himself that so far from this Hall being defective as a place to be heard in, there is no better hall anywhere, no place in the Union, I undertake to say, where if the people occupying the Hall will maintain silence the speaker can be better heard.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask the gentleman to speak a little louder so that I can hear him.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will explain why the gentleman cannot hear me and why there is difficulty in hearing other gentlemen here. It is because there are two hundred men on this floor talking among themselves at the same time the Speaker is addressing the House. We all know that in their conversation members are in the habit of speaking in their ordinary tones of voice and take very little pains to lower it. Then we have the lobbies here filled with gentlemen who are also talking in their ordinary tones of voice; and the galleries are filled with ladies and gentlemen talking in their ordinary tones of voice. There is not a church or public hall in the United States where, if while the clergyman or orator was attempting to address the audience the audience should do precisely what is being done every moment in this House, he would be heard any better than members are heard here. It is very easy to ascertain the correctness of what I say. I undertake to say that at this moment there is no gentleman entitled to a seat on this floor who cannot be heard in every portion of this Hall and in the galleries besides if those here will maintain the silence that is maintained in churches and lecture-rooms.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to make a single observation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have no time to be interrupted, particularly by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We are very still now.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I want to ask every gentleman within the sound of my voice if we have any difficulty in hearing the Chaplain in the morning when he opens the exercises here?

Mr. MERRIAM. Because few members are in their seats so early, and because even Congressmen bend their heads in silence when reminded that they are in the presence of their Maker.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. We hear him in every part of the Hall. Why? Because we show him the respect of maintaining silence and not indulging in conversation on the floor of the House. I am unwilling that these complaints against this Hall shall be made here, as they have been made, without having the real difficulty called to the attention of the House.

In regard to the pending paragraph which it is proposed to strike out, I hope it will be stricken out, and that not one dollar will be expended by Congress for that purpose until some correct plan for heating and ventilating this Hall as it should be heated and ventilated shall be devised. I wish I had time to tell members about the defective construction of the heating and ventilating contrivances which are under our feet, and how almost impossible it is that any effective system can be adopted by following their present plan of construction. My objection to this paragraph is that this subject has not been considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds nor by any other committee that I know of.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COBURN. I move an amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying a word or two about this Hall. It has been extolled to-day lavishly by some gentlemen, and I cannot agree with them in any particular. To me it is the most objectionable place I ever saw for a body of men to assemble in. The air comes in at the wrong place and in the wrong direction. When the weather is warm the sun shines down through the top of the Hall on the heads of members, and it is a source of sickness and annoyance from the beginning to the end of the heated term. This Hall should have been constructed with the doors and windows opening to the outer air, and the light should come in, as in ordinary rooms, from the sides of the building. I can imagine nothing more similar to the plan of this Hall, so far as heating and lighting are concerned, than hot-houses which are used for sprouting cabbage-plants, &c. The glass top of this Hall has about the same effect on the heads of several gentlemen that the glass tops of hot-houses have upon the plants in them. I would vote to-day for an appropriation to erect a "wigwam" or some other inclosure in which Congressmen might assemble and where they would have an ordinarily decent place to do the public business. If anything could reconcile me to the continuance of this Hall with its present arrangements as the place of meeting of the House of Representatives, it is the fact that it will be occupied in the next Congress by a large democratic majority. If I could be so malicious as to desire the sickness or possible death of my political opponents, that might be a reason for voting against an appropriation to provide some other place for the meeting of the House of Representatives or some improvement of this Hall. But I do say that much as I am opposed politically to my democratic antagonists and unwilling as I am that they should continue in power, I will vote the very largest possible appropriation to build a new hall or to remodel the present one or to erect a "wigwam," so that our democratic friends may live in some comfort during the short time that they will be in power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to oppose the amendment. As I am about to retire from Congress, I want to bear my testimony against this Hall as a very unsuitable place for occupancy by the House of Representatives. I agree with every one of the gentlemen who have criticised it as an unfit place for the assemblage of a public body. I can account in no way for the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] except by taking his words literally, as I understood them—that he is insensible to heat and insensible to cold, insensible to light and insensible to darkness. Only a reason of that kind can account for the fact that he has not found out before this time that this Hall is an unfit place for the use of the House of Representatives.

Why, sir, go around this Hall to-day and you will find nine out of ten of the members suffering with colds, sore throats—threatened perhaps with pneumonia or inflammation of the lungs. There is scarcely a well man with whom I have spoken for the last ten or twenty days on this floor. During the time when we were here the whole of two nights "filibustering," as it was called, upon the civil-rights bill, almost every man in this Hall became more or less sick. I at one time sent for the Doorkeeper, telling him that everybody in this part of the Hall was in a chill. He went to the thermometer and came back telling me that it indicated seventy-five degrees. I replied, "I am suffering with a chill; this Hall is cold." He then examined some of the flues or other arrangements under the seats here, and found that cold air from out of doors was actually blowing in upon the feet of all of us here.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact how seldom it is that we hear a cough in this House as compared with other congregations of people?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why it is very seldom that a voice is heard. The best voice in this House cannot be heard from one end of the Hall to the other, even when the Hall is perfectly still. I undertake to say that there is not a man here who can be heard throughout the entire length and breadth of this Hall even when profound stillness otherwise prevails; for then the reverberation tends to drown the voice. If any one can be heard throughout this Hall I can be, when my voice is in good condition; and having inquired how far my voice could be heard, I have learned that unless the persons listening are facing you, they cannot hear at all what is said in this Hall.

There is but one word further I want to say. The sunlight of heaven does not shine here; and that is not a fit place for human beings where God's sunlight cannot shine upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Both amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation in lieu of moieties in certain cases under customs-revenue laws, $200,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out the last word. I take leave now to call the attention of the House to the necessity which now for the first time arises for such an appropriation as this in our regular appropriation bill. It results from the change of the law agreed to at the last session by this Congress in the interest, as it was claimed, of the revenue. Upon that subject I desire to say one or two words.

Heretofore all the expenses of collecting sums due from those who had defrauded the revenue were deducted from the shares assigned to the informers. Although that system had obtained in the practice of the Government for ninety years; although after being attacked in 1846 by one of these chronic reformers and in some respects changed, it had to be restored two or three years later; yet in spite of all that experience a newspaper howl was gotten up by fraudulent, cheating merchants. Now let nobody get up and say that I have charged all merchants with defrauding and cheating. I say "fraudulent, cheating merchants." On one page of the newspaper you will see half a column of howling, and on another three columns of advertisements of the very merchants who have suffered under the law. That is kept up to-day. And when I ventured at the request of the Attorney-General to bring to the attention of the House the necessity that he should have some money to obtain evidence, the New York Tribune of yesterday comes to us with the statement that I had secured the passage of a provision in favor of Sanborn; that he was to be employed to get this evidence. This charge is made without any reason, without any knowledge, without any foundation except in the imagination of lying newspaper hacks or correspondents.

The man who got that evidence lives in Kentucky and is known to the gentleman from Kentucky. It is not Mr. Sanborn at all.

Mr. BECK. What is that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am speaking of a piece of evidence in existence about a fraudulent claim against the United States in the hands of a Kentucky man and not Mr. Sanborn, of Massachusetts, at all. Yet the newspapers insisted, when I moved that might be procured among others, it was done in the interest of Mr. Sanborn.

Let me say one other word. You made an excellent collection last year of withheld taxes since you repealed what is called the Sanborn contracts. How do you suppose we did it? Because your Commissioner of Internal Revenue has employed Mr. Sanborn under contract to aid him.

Mr. PAGE. The revenues have fallen off more than $12,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Another point. It is the judgment of every revenue officer, the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, that in consequence of this law the customs revenue has fallen off from fifteen to twelve million dollars.

Mr. MERRIAM. Have we not the same men collecting then as before?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. MERRIAM. The natural logic would be, having the same men there, that they did not attend to their business before or are not attending to it now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will explain all that.

Mr. DAWES. Will you let me interrupt you?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. State whether there is any evidence on record in any quarter which justifies your statement now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Point out where it is.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will tell you. Go to your Commissioner's report, where he tells you how many millions you have lost by the importation of silks and other things in the way of baggage this very year. The Commissioner of Customs tells you that more millions have been lost than you will get on your whisky tax if your new bill pass.

Mr. DAWES. Excuse me; what I wish to know is whether there is anything on record which justifies the statement of the gentleman that it is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that more than $12,000,000 have been lost by the repeal of that law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That was put into the Secretary's report.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, then, I desire to say you will find that when the Secretary did not like the report of one of his subordinates, as for instance the Treasurer of the United States, as to the necessity of greenback currency and 3.65 bonds, he had it very properly struck out of that report, but in the Commissioner of Customs's report you will find a statement of a much larger sum in that single item.

I will now send up to the Clerk's desk to be read, if I have it here, and I think I have, a statement of the evidence of one of the partners of A. T. Stewart & Co., which is published in all the papers. Here it is, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SILK SMUGGLERS.

Mr. H. B. Claflin, the dry-goods man, talked with Collector Arthur for two hours yesterday about the silk-smuggling frauds. The collector denies that Mr. Claflin told him of the existence of the frauds. The information which led to their discovery was furnished, it is said, by Mr. N. P. Rice, a custom-house bond clerk. He received a bond from Charles S. Lawrence, the runaway broker and lawyer, in which he detected several irregularities. He communicated his discovery to Mr. Balch, the chief clerk of the ninth division, and they made a joint examination of all the bonds filed by Lawrence on previous entries of goods. They found evidence of forgery and fraud in every one. The names of the importers of the goods proved fictitious.

The facts were laid before Deputy Collector Phelps, Collector Arthur, and Surveyor Sharpe, and an investigation was begun under their supervision. The false invoices of silk, eleven in number, showed that the deputy collector of the warehouse division, Colonel Des Anges, had designated the "dummy" cases of cotton hosiery for appraisement in every instance. He was summoned before General Arthur and General Sharpe and asked for an explanation. After they had heard his story they looked on him as the victim of circumstances, knowing the many ways corrupt merchants and cunning brokers had of tampering with papers that had passed through the custom-house all right. They warned Colonel Des Anges to guard against signing any more of Lawrence's invoices without the closest scrutiny, and to report to them any that he presented. Collector Arthur was so assured of his innocence that he consulted with him daily about the steps he was taking to fathom the fraud. There was no suspicion against him until after the seizure of the eight cases of silk and one case of cotton hosiery at the Hoboken stores by Deputy Surveyor Klinck. The invoice showed that he had marked case 109, containing the hosiery, as the one to be sent to the public stores for appraisement, and that he had done this subsequent to the warning of the collector.

While he was chief clerk of the warehouse division, Colonel Des Anges bought a house in Plainfield, New Jersey, and has been living there since. It is said that his father gave him $100,000 in North Carolina bonds when he left England, and that he gets a large sum of money from home every year.

The magnitude of Lawrence's operations is greater than the revenue authorities supposed. His handiwork is seen in many old cases of fraud. There is evidence of the existence of a "pool" to defraud the Government and make a market for smuggled silks in this city. The "pool" had its headquarters in London, and Lawrence acted as agent here. The investigating officers know of twenty invoices that he has undervalued, and think that twice as many remain undiscovered.

There is a black-list in the custom-house of brokers and others who are not accepted on bonds because they have no property. Lawrence's name was not on this, and consequently his bonds were regarded as good. It seems that all of his property is out of the reach of the law. His wealth is estimated at $250,000. Part of it is in money and part in real estate in his wife's name. He generally carried $10,000 worth of diamonds on his person. Shortly before his flight he invoiced seventeen cases of silk as cotton goods. He got warning from his allies in the custom-house that they were to be confiscated, and to save them he exported them in bond to Montreal, beyond the reach of the officers. The twelve cases of silverware seized by special agent Thomas Brown at 6 Park place, in H. G. Levey's store, are said to have been imported through Lawrence's agency. They were entered as shells, in the name of J. C. Parkin. The latter is a myth. Shells are on the free list, and to keep up the deception of the invoice two cases of shells accompanied the silverware. These went to the appraiser. They were sent there by Deputy Collector Des Anges.

SILK SMUGGLING—INTERVIEW WITH MR. LIBBY, OF A. T. STEWART & CO.

Question. Of course, Mr. Libby, you are aware of the events now being exposed with respect to smuggling silks, &c. We want to know how these silks are put upon the market and by whom.

Answer. That I suppose to be well known. A prominent auction-house have for a year past sold periodically, sometimes twice a week, large lines of these silks, and at prices far below what it costs to legitimately import the article. There are, besides these auction sales, some large and prominent houses dealing heavily in silk goods at prices below cost of importation, but who really import very little on their own account. Indeed, I believe they publicly state that they can purchase smuggled silks cheaper than they can import them. Applications are frequently made to us to purchase silks cheap, but we do not think it proper to deal with keepers of small liquor-shops and small fur dealers who have such things for sale, nor will we permit any of our buyers to purchase at these auction sales to which I have alluded.

Q. Why is it that this smuggling has seemed to have increased so much lately? Has the repeal of the moiety system had anything to do with it?

A. Undoubtedly. The Government never did a more unwise thing than its repeal of the moiety system, which has been in existence almost from the formation of the Republic, and in my opinion is inseparable from any system of high tariffs on imports. Every Government has so considered it.

Q. How in your business do you meet the competition which must arise from this state of things?

A. By ceasing to import or deal in certain classes of goods. We have been obliged to do this for some time, and the number of articles affected by smuggling is daily increasing. We are in hopes that as it leads to a palpable diminution in the revenues of the Government from imports some action must speedily be taken by the customs officials on the subject, and thus enable us to do a legitimate business in importing. Until then we must confine ourselves to such goods as do not compete with this kind of fraud.

Q. What would you recommend to be done under the circumstances?

A. From the facts as stated any one can answer that. We can only hope for aid from the press, assisted by the Government officials and Congress. Upon the latter the lever of "diminished and insufficient revenue" must sooner or later have its effect.—Graphic.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is the testimony of Mr. Libby, the partner of A. T. Stewart & Co.

The partner of Mr. H. B. Claflin, the great dry-goods man, went before the Commissioner and swore they were obliged to buy their silk goods of those men who imported them without the payment of duty, as they could buy silk goods 40 per cent. cheaper in New York than they could import them for; that they were either to stop the selling of silk goods or to buy them of those men who imported them free of duty. That is the testimony and such is the fact.

Now we are called upon to pay $200,000 out of the Treasury for the detection of frauds.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let me ask whether the gentleman refers to Claflin, one of the leading merchants of New York City?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last four words, and I do so for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] an opportunity further to discuss this matter. I yield him my time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I observe that my colleague [Mr. DAWES] has risen. I yield the floor to hear what my colleague has to say.

Mr. DAWES. I came in since this debate commenced, so that I scarcely know what course it has been taking. But I understood my colleague to say that it was the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that a very large amount, an increased amount of smuggling—defrauding the revenue—has been caused by the repeal of the moiety laws, amounting to more than $12,000,000. I do not find any such thing upon record from the Secretary of the Treasury nor from any official of the Government.

My colleague has read from the testimony given somewhere, I do not know where, of a member of the firm of A. T. Stewart & Co., who expresses the opinion that the repeal of the moiety law last winter largely increased smuggling the present year; and says that a partner of the firm of H. B. Claflin & Co. said they were obliged to stop importing goods, and trade with smugglers, all because of that law.

Now let my colleague state to the committee that the law of last year, so far as smuggling is concerned, has left the moiety system exactly as it was before—more stringent, if anything, and more efficient; that it has only taken away from three officers of the Government—the collector, the naval officer, and the surveyor of the port—these moieties and given them to the officers who make the detection. That is the way the law of last session has left it. These three officers came before the committee and Jayne himself, all of them testifying that the collector, the surveyor of the port, and the naval officer did not know anything about these frauds at all; they depended upon detectives; they knew nothing about them. And when we took the long list and asked Jayne and these officers what does the naval officer, the collector, and the surveyor of the port know about these cases of fraud, each one of them said, "Nothing at all." We left the moiety, so far as smuggling is concerned, to be given as a stimulus to the officers who are engaged in the detection of the smuggling.

The frauds which are committed are not through smuggling, but underappraisal and false entries—frauds in the custom-house; not frauds by dodging the custom-house, which is the definition of smuggling. And no Secretary of the Treasury, not even any one of the custom-house officers who have rolled in the wealth of moities heretofore, has so asserted—has been willing to put himself on record as saying that taking one-half of the enormous sums from these three individuals—the surveyor of the port, the collector, and the naval officer—has increased the frauds upon the revenue.

There are persons who try to get up a public sentiment of that kind, but they are the men who have felt the operation of the law, and no others.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire my colleague to answer me a question; for if I did not know him to be an honest man I should certainly conceive he was not from this speech of his. But I cannot conceive how he can have so misled himself. Does he mean to say the informer can now have a quarter of all the pains and penalties adjudged?

Mr. DAWES. I did not say any such thing. I said so far as smuggling is concerned the informer had one-half of all the smuggled goods, and we made the law more efficient and more certain when it was provided that the man who detected the smuggling should have it. Now my colleague wants to know if I stated the informer was to have one-quarter of all the penalties for frauds upon the revenue. My colleague says that smuggling has increased to the amount of $12,000,000 through the change in the law. I stated that was not the case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is precisely what I complain of; that the small matter which is called smuggling is what they bring in. Somebody brings in a package, and that is called smuggling. But where great frauds have been committed they are not included in that term. I use "smuggling" as a general term, to mean all the frauds upon the customs revenue. They say they have made the law more efficient. O, yes; if a man is caught with a box of cigars, the informer gets half that box; but if a merchant imports in a steamboat three-quarters of a million of dollars of cargo, and sends, as he has done and as he has been detected in doing, but one out of ten of the boxes to the appraising office and gets those appraised as cotton hose—as a cargo of cotton hose—when they are silk goods worth almost a million of dollars, there is then a fraud of almost a million at a time. That is the trouble, and why I said I could not conceive how so honest a man as I believe my colleague to be could undertake so to mislead the House on such a question.

The question is, is our revenue increasing or decreasing from these frauds, and there is nobody that doubts that it is decreasing from these frauds.

Mr. MERRIAM. The gentleman says that nobody doubts it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, no; I do not want to hear you any more; do not interrupt me again. I understand at once what the gentleman wants, and I did not make much of a mistake when I said that nobody doubted whether the revenue was increased or decreased by the repeal of this law. Pardon me; I myself on the first day of the session introduced a bill to take away a quarter of what was given to these three officers, so that there is not really an issue between us. It was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and they have been sitting upon it ever since just as they have been sitting upon the Pacific Mail matter and have not hatched anything yet. There is no issue between us. Gentlemen insisted that inasmuch as there was a large temptation given to the merchants to commit frauds there should be a large reward given to the informer as to those frauds. Gentlemen insisted that we should not allow these frauds to be disclosed because there was a large temptation to those employed by merchants to let frauds be known. And now let me ask you, on looking to your record, how much money has been collected this year in consequence of the commission of these frauds?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I renew it. I desire to show whether I was accurate or not; I will not say anything about my honesty.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; we agree about that.

Mr. DAWES. I want to show whether I was accurate or not, and I go back to what I heard my colleague say, and that is that smuggling had been carried on to such an increased extent since the repeal of moieties that in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury more than $12,000,000 has been lost by that repeal and that the efficiency of the law so far as the suppression of smuggling is concerned had been impaired by depriving the informers of one-half of the proceeds. Now I will read the law as we left it:

> That whenever any officer of the customs or other persons shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise, in the act of being smuggled or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure after deducting all duties, costs, and charges connected therewith.

So that if it is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that smuggling has been increased because he has not paid the detective enough, he is authorized to pay him one-half of all these proceeds and it is his fault if he has not compensated him enough, up to the point of his conscientious and faithful discharge of his duty. If the detective's conscience and sense of fidelity must be quickened up to one-half of the proceeds, here is the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to stimulate him to fidelity that shall be exactly measured by one-half of the proceeds. That is what I entered into this debate to show. It was not to show anything about the appraisals or false entries in the custom-houses. When I enter into debate and answer a gentleman and he raises another issue, I let him fight out that issue to his heart's content.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending paragraph be closed at some time. How many minutes do gentlemen desire to have for debate on this paragraph?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want five minutes more myself.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Say fifteen minutes, and we will agree to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I will ask then that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio that all debate be closed on the pending paragraph in fifteen minutes. The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. MERRIAM. I am not surprised at the gentleman from Massachusetts who introduced a bill in relation to the Sanborn contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to gentlemen upon the floor that if they occupy each a full five minutes but three gentlemen can speak; but if gentlemen desire to divide the time up so as speak a shorter time, they can do so.

Mr. MERRIAM. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who was the father of the law under which the Sanborn contracts were made and which has so scandalized the republican party, should rise on this floor and denounce the merchants of the city of New York as rascals, as "fraudulent and cheating merchants." The spectacle exhibited last year in the New York custom-house before we repealed the moiety law was such as brought the blush of shame to the cheek of every pure American citizen. The country was shocked that any one officer could receive from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars in a single year from moieties wrung from the pockets of some of the purest merchants on this continent, in one instance by threats of the penitentiary and shaking the cold steel of handcuffs in his face; that one naval officer should receive more money for his own use than the salaries of the President of the United States and all the members of his Cabinet, or the Chief Justice and all the associate judges of the Supreme Court of the United States—that one man whose work did not compare in responsibility or personal labor with that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who receives not one-tenth as much as he.

And a portion of this money, so wrung from the merchants of New York, was used as a political corruption fund. My authority for this assertion is the naval officer of the port of New York, who told me that he had used a portion of what he had so received to aid in carrying the elections in different States.

It was my fortune, I may say, to introduce into this House, one year ago the 4th of March coming, a bill providing that no officer of the Government should receive any pay, directly on indirectly, except a salary fixed by law. Within forty-eight hours from the introduction of that bill the naval officer of the port of New York was on the floor of this House endeavoring to learn what was meant by that bill; and when he learned that we meant business, that we meant to keep from his clutch from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars a year, he returned to New York full of malice and disgust.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Did he ever make any complaint about it?

Mr. MERRIAM. Yes; I heard that he was in my district within ten days thereafter intriguing to defeat my nomination. I called upon him on my way home and asked him upon what basis a naval officer of the port of New York could justify himself for an attempt to run the politics of the rural districts. He replied that he liked me personally very well, but that my standard of political morality was on too high a plane of virtue to run our party on. I am aware that it is of little importance what his utterance might be, save as it reflects the malice of the New York custom-house ring whenever a representative of the people dare stand manfully up and work for reform.

It must be evident to the country that the moiety system as it formerly existed not only filled the air with scandal, but corrupted the men who were made rich in a single year under its operation—a system so wicked and cruel toward honorable merchants of life-long unimpeachable character that it would be a crime in any Congress to restore it. I know there are men on this floor who are desirous to convey the idea to this House that it is important to restore the moiety system, as it existed before we abolished it. The argument of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is in that direction. I want to warn the House that whenever that is done the same corruption will exist and the same outrages be repeated as before.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. What is known as the anti-moiety law was passed at the last session of Congress in response to petitions from all parts of the country and a popular demand which was so strong that there was not upon this floor a single voice or vote in opposition to the measure when it was put upon its passage. Has there come from any quarter one single petition for the repeal of that law? I do not know of one word from any quarter, from merchants, from officers, from citizens, for any change in it. I say that until a petition comes from some quarter we have a right to assume that the law is satisfactory.

More than that, the frauds to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] refers particularly, the frauds in the silk importations, have been discovered during the current fiscal year, since the repeal of the moiety system. Those frauds extend back for many years, for nine or ten years; and some of the very cases brought into court run back beyond the period when these moieties were repealed, whereas the detection of them occurred during the current fiscal year, after the moieties were repealed.

Now, if our revenue had fallen off from the repeal of the moiety law, then the falling off in commerce ought to have been only in imports. The record of importations alone should have shown a falling off, whereas our commerce in other respects ought to have been healthful. The fact is that in the six months next succeeding the repeal of the moieties, as compared with the same six months of the preceding year, our imports fell off but $5,000,000 or thereabouts, whereas our exports fell off during the same six months by more than $20,000,000. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts, with all his ingenuity, will not claim that our exports have fallen off because the moieties were repealed. Neither have our imports fallen off nor the revenues from our imports fallen off from any such cause as that.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts will read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, sent to this House at the commencement of this session, he will find a statement showing, from the condition of this country, why our imports have fallen off, and why, therefore, our revenues from imports have fallen off. Why is it that only with reference to our customs duties it is necessary to pay to our officers large moieties? Long ago we repealed moieties with reference to our internal-revenue system, and by universal consent that change has worked well. The system, as it now stands upon our statute-books, has worked well in Great Britain for generations.

Why is it that our officers need to be tempted with higher rewards, need to have fees, to have moieties which would make their salaries twice and threefold the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury? I hold that it is not necessary. The officers in the New York custom-house, where the most of the moieties were received in past years, have during the current fiscal year detected quite as many offenses against the revenue as they ever did when they received the large moieties, and that proves that they did not need such an incentive to perform their duty.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the first place, in regard to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] I did not understand what the trouble with him was. But he has told us now. It seems that one of his constituents, the naval officer of the port of New York, came up into his district and beat him, on the ground that he was running the party, as he said, on too high a grade of morality. And it seems the rest of his constituents thought so too, and concluded to keep him at home.

Mr. MERRIAM. I do not care to spread the facts over the RECORD, but that is not the case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that the gentleman will not let his private griefs interfere with his public acts.

Mr. MERRIAM. I have no private griefs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now I am going to deal with the fairness of my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. In the first place, section 2 of the act of last session provides—

That all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures under the customs-revenue laws, or any share therein or commission thereon, are paid to informers, or officers of customs, or other officers of the United States, are hereby repealed.

That provision repeals all moieties. My colleague said it does not repeal them except as to three officers. Then section 4 provides—

That whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all duties, costs, and charges connected therewith.

This provision my colleague called attention to; but he forgot to read the proviso:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act, smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or with like intent attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom-house or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination.

Mr. DAWES. Is not that a pretty good definition of smuggling?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It may be a good definition of smuggling; but everybody knows that great frauds on the revenue are effected by passing goods through the custom-house without paying the proper duty.

Mr. DAWES. That is a separate kind of fraud.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is all there is of the provision. It was expressly, carefully, and I think intentionally guarded so as not to touch the large merchants; only the poor fellow with his pack on his back.

The section provides further "that whenever any person not an officer of the United States shall furnish any information to the district attorney, there shall be paid him a reasonable compensation, not exceeding $5,000;" that is, you will get the information if it can be obtained for that sum; but there is nothing certain to the man who gives the information.

Now, there has been a large falling off in the revenue and an immense amount of fraud in the matter of baggage alone. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the last report of the Commissioner of Customs.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is estimated by many that the American tourists returning from Europe during the year ending June 30, 1873, numbered 36,830, and that each person brought, on an average, seven trunks filled with dutiable goods claimed to be personal baggage not dutiable. We have thus an aggregate of 257,810 trunks filled with articles claimed as duty free, representing, on a valuation of $500 for each trunk, the enormous sum of $128,905,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, sir, those figures as to the number of tourists and trunks are obtained from the Bureau of Statistics. The average number of trunks is found to be seven. A man leaves the country with a carpet-bag and comes back with seven trunks! The consequence is that nearly $129,000,000 worth of goods have been passed through the custom-house without paying 50 per cent. duty, which would legally be due upon the contents of average trunks.

The law of last year declares that smuggling shall consist in passing goods around the custom-house, and thus all inducement to stop goods passing through the custom-house is taken away. There results in this way a loss (if the estimate of the Commissioner of Customs is correct) of $60,000,000 in the annual revenue of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending paragraph was by unanimous consent limited to fifteen minutes, which time has expired.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have the rebel archives and records of captured property examined and information furnished therefrom for the use of the Government, $6,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is an amendment which was agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations, but by mistake was not printed in the bill. I move therefore to insert after the paragraph just read the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay the first installment due under contract made by him in accordance with the joint resolution approved June 22, 1874, with Miss Vinnie Ream for the statue of the late Admiral Farragut, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, due from the United States, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $1,060,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend the paragraph just read so that it will read as follows:

To pay on behalf of the United States, as a portion of the general expense of the District of Columbia, to be expended by the commissioners of the District, $1,060,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that change of language.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend this paragraph by adding the following:

Only to be drawn successively; no salary to be changed from the standard fixed under the law of June 20, 1874.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I move to reduce the appropriation $60,000, and I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether they have deducted $182,000 advanced as a portion of the money to be appropriated by Congress toward the support of the government in this District?

Mr. GARFIELD. This appropriation is for the next fiscal year and what the gentleman refers to was for the past year. As he well knows, this bill does not take effect until the 1st of July next.

Mr. FORT. I understand that, but the gentleman from Ohio will remember that the language of that law to which I have referred was that it should be so much advanced to be deducted from whatever should be appropriated toward paying the expenses of this District. Now I wish to know whether they require $1,060,000 besides that, or whether the $182,000 ought to be deducted out of this sum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois that the estimate of the commissioners was $1,210,000. We are not appropriating anything for the current year, but making appropriation only for the next fiscal year. In the present current year there are some deficiencies. The committee reckoned if the tax to be levied on this District is one cent and a half we would have to put in a million and a half of dollars more. We came to the conclusion that we would proceed on the supposition that there would be a tax levied equal to about 2 per cent., the highest figure in the report of the commissioners. That would have required us to have appropriated $1,210,000 as the balance; but when we looked through the various items of appropriation it seemed as if the tax on personal property in connection with the 2 per cent. on realty would make our proportion smaller. We also thought that the amount of work estimated for this District might reasonably be cut down. We therefore concluded to make this appropriation $200,000 less than the estimate, believing it was safe to do it.

Mr. RANDALL. One word. We advanced last session a large sum of money toward carrying on the government of this District. We advanced the other day $185,000. This was done with the understanding that it was to be returned to us. I wish to know, therefore, whether in making up this amount deductions have been made by the execution of that agreement under which we were to get our money back?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will see that we cannot do that. We must have some law fixing our proportion, and we have been waiting some law laying down some rule on this question. We have been waiting for the establishment of some government in this District. In the absence of any such law we have been compelled to use our best judgment in making appropriations for the next fiscal year.

Mr. RANDALL. We have made some advances toward this District. We advanced for the board of health $94,000. Last year we advanced $1,300,000 which was to be returned to us. The other day we loaned this District $185,000 to enable it to pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds. I wish to know whether these advances were not in effect appropriations toward the government of this District?

Mr. FORT. That is exactly my point.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee of investigation into the affairs of this District found there is a large unadjusted balance due from the Government to the District for work done. We do not know about that. The Committee on Appropriations were not able to go into that subject. We have left it an open question to be settled by Congress hereafter.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not see, then, how we can ever get it back. I am inclined to think, therefore, that all the money we have loaned to the District we may as well at once set down as that much appropriated to it and give ourselves no further trouble about it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have ever been able to ascertain upon what authority the Government of the United States is bound to pay these expenses. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Government of the United States has property to the extent of about 40 per cent. at least of all the property here.

Mr. THOMPSON. The relative value of property held by the Government and individuals has never been settled. The gentleman says these are appropriations made to pay the expenses for the improvement of streets and so on in this city. How is the Government liable for that?

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say that.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is the explanation which is made. I do not understand that the Government is directly liable for one dollar of expenses of this District. We are liable precisely as any other property-holder in the District is, but not otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken as to one fact. This is the only city in the world I know anything about where the actual fee-simple of the streets is in the United States. That is not so in any other city in the world. There cannot be a stroke of work on any of the streets here without the consent of Congress. Many of the large avenues were made large, not for the benefit of the people living here, but for the glory and dignity of the Government. And everybody must recognize that it would be a gross injustice to take one of these broad avenues and compel the property-holders to pave it when the Government made it so for its own benefit.

Mr. THOMPSON. The true principle I think is this: Let the Government pay a due proportion of the taxes assessed upon the property it owns, and let the men who own property in the city and have the benefits of owning property in the city, derived from the location of the Government here, pay their just proportion and no more. But until that is ascertained, I object to any statement being made, either verbally or written in the bill, that this is a portion of the money due by the Government to the District of Columbia. The Government owes no proportion to the contractors. It owes no proportion to those who hold the debt against the District. But indirectly it will be liable to make up a proportion by assessments on its property or by a contribution based on some ascertained proportion which it ought to pay. That is different from saying to the lot-owners and the property-owners of this city, "We own the fee of the streets, of the alleys, and of the squares, and therefore we are bound to pay all the expenses of the city, for fire, for water, &c., and then we will assess you hereafter a small proportion of that."

I wish therefore that this whole section were stricken out, and that an appropriation bill to be brought in hereafter shall provide for this. This paragraph ought to be stricken ought. The Government is establishing here a dangerous precedent which will trouble and plague them hereafter. And until the relative positions occupied by the Government and the District are fixed, and upon that basis some adjustment is made of their comparative duties, there will be trouble.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not make that motion. The only amendment I offered was to strike out the last word.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 339 add these words:

Provided, That from this appropriation the Treasury of the United States shall be reimbursed in the following sum for amounts paid by the United States for the District, $97,740.50, paid by act of April, 18, 1874, for school-teachers of the District.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I send to the Clerk's desk the statute, and ask that it may be read.

Mr. CHIPMAN. If I understand correctly the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, that sum has already been paid, having been provided for by the act of June, 1874.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the Clerk to read the statute.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act making appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $97,740.50 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia from the 1st day of September, 1873, to the 1st day of March, 1874; and that the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax, to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act, upon personal property including banks and other corporations in the said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States. The money hereby appropriated shall be disbursed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Education.

Approved, April 18, 1874.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The officers of the District came in and told us they could not pay their school-teachers; that the teachers were poor and needing the money; that the money should be advanced; and if we advanced the money it should be reimbursed by the District through the collection of taxes. That has never been done. The Government gave the District government $97,000 to pay their teachers for which we were not liable; and I see no reason why that should not be deducted from the amount now to be appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand, from gentlemen familiar with this, that this sum has been paid back. It ought not, at any rate, to be taken out of this appropriation. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have not the commissioners' report before me, but I am strongly under the impression that this has been paid; and if it is taken out of the school fund it will create a deficiency to that extent. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment for a few moments I will get the report of the commissioners and ascertain precisely how it is.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman states that this amount has been refunded to the United States by the District, I withdraw the amendment. Does he make that statement?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have stated that that is my impression. I ask the gentleman to give me a moment that I may have time to consult the commissioners' report.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will withdraw the amendment for the present if I can have the right reserved to return to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. This paragraph will be passed over for the present if there be no objection, the right being reserved to return to it.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

To defray the expense of conducting the sanitary service of the District of Columbia, $26,117.50: Provided, That the commissioners of the District shall pay for such service to the board of health a like amount out of the treasury of the District of Columbia, which they are hereby authorized and required to do.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 343, after the words "shall pay," insert "concurrently."

I will explain the object of this. In other instances where there is joint payment by the Government of the United States and the government of the District, it is provided that dollar for dollar should come in from the District concurrently with the payment from the Government of the United States. In this case they have heretofore been taking all from the Government of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out that entire section, and I do it for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether this amount is the same as the appropriation last year?

Mr. GARFIELD. We paid $90,000 last year and in addition to that $20,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have made no examination as to whether it was necessary to appropriate as much as this. I have heard it stated that the expenditures for this purpose are much too large.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations had the board of health before them and inquired as to this matter and had a full hearing. The gentleman will find on pages 16 and 17 of the printed report accompanying this bill the amount and charges of the total expenditure.

Mr. RANDALL. I saw by the papers that the members of the board of health were before the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of obtaining an increase of salary. Is anything of that kind included in this?

Mr. GARFIELD. That was not adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the gentleman informed as to the sanitary results of this board and as to whether those results are in any way adequate to the expenditure upon them?

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations is satisfied that the board of health of this city is doing its work as well as the board of health of any other city. We know nothing about the results of their labor, but they claim that the mortuary record shows a healthier condition in this city than in any other city.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was aware of that claim, and the object of my question was to ascertain whether it was a just and well-founded claim?

Mr. GARFIELD. I can do no more than give a statement of the facts as they appeared before the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of the salaries of the inspector of gas and meters and assistant inspector for the District of Columbia, $3,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I find that that is a new appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is in accordance with an act of Congress. The Government has to pay so large an amount for gas that an act was passed last session which created this officer for the protection of the Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Jacob Parmenter, of Plattsburgh, New York, the amount paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment rendered against him for an official act as collector of customs for the district of Champlain, $684.10.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to make a point of order upon that clause. Is it in pursuance of any law calling for this appropriation. I believe it is not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman is mistaken; but this matter was referred to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] as a sub-committee to examine, and he found that this officer had a judgment rendered against him for some act he performed which he believed to be legal, but the judgment went against him, and he believed that he had a claim against the Government for the amount of that judgment. It is simply an appropriation to carry on the Government. We are always bound to stand behind an officer in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This is a very simple question. If the appropriation is in pursuance of law the Secretary of the Treasury can pay it. If there is no law requiring him to pay it and the district court has rendered a judgment against this officer and it has been collected and this is to refund the amount so collected, I do not know of any law requiring that we should make an appropriation for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why we are constantly making appropriations to pay the judgments of the courts against officers of the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It seems to me that a provision of this kind is entirely out of place in an appropriation bill, and is a mode of giving this party relief which is exceedingly unusual.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Ohio exhibit any law covering this case? If he can, the Chair will be glad to hear it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not the law before me.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I want to refer the Chair to the fact——

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask that the paragraph be passed over for the present until the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] who had the subject under consideration shall be present.

No objection was made, and the paragraph was passed over informally.

Mr. TREMAIN. I move to insert after the paragraph just passed over the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Charles Morgan for general average on the ship Alabama, $3,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on that amendment. But as I understand the gentleman proposes to yield, I will wait until it comes up again.

Mr. TREMAIN. I yield to the Delegate from the District of Columbia for a moment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I promised the committee that I would inform myself as to the payment into the Treasury of the amount proposed to be taken from the District fund by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] I find that I was mistaken as to the fund. We have reimbursed another school fund, but the one to which the gentleman alludes was a fund to be reimbursed by the levy of a tax. That tax was not levied, because the District government, which by the act of April 18, 1874, was directed to impose it was legislated out of office by the act of the 20th of June following, and in that act there was no provision made for enforcing this act of Congress. I will wait until the gentleman renews the amendment, if he does renew it, and then I will make a statement in regard to the matter.

Mr TREMAIN. I now ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have raised a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. TREMAIN. The Chair will find by looking at the minutes that there was an order of the House made allowing this amendment to be offered to this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If the rules were suspended for the purpose, that obviates my point of order.

Mr. TREMAIN. The rules were suspended to allow it to be offered, and it comes reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary. There cannot be the slightest objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase such works of art for ornamenting the Capitol as may be ordered and approved, $15,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to insert after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the following:

That to equalize the salaries in the Library of Congress there shall be appropriated for two assistant librarians, at $1,600, the additional sum of $250 each per annum on their present salaries; and for two assistant librarians at $1,440, two assistant librarians at $1,200, and two assistant librarians at $1,000, there shall be appropriated the sum of $300 each per annum on their present salaries.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I raise the point of order that there is no law for that.

Mr. KELLOGG. No law for it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. No.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is right; and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order. The amendment is pre-eminently right.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I shall insist upon it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, if necessary, I shall ask as soon as I can for a suspension of the rules to make the amendment in order. I would say that the point of order is not well taken, for there is no law to prevent our increasing the salaries of these persons.

Mr. GARFIELD. Their salaries are fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled upon the point of order, and will hear the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] if he wishes to say anything upon it.

Mr. KELLOGG. All I wish to say is to repeat what I have just said, that I know of no law which prevents the increase of these salaries; and if I am correctly informed there is no such law.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not germane at this point in the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I would ask the gentleman from Connecticut if this amendment has been suggested to him by the Librarian?

Mr. KELLOGG. It did not come from the Librarian at all. The subject was referred to us of equalizing the salaries of all the employés in this Capitol, the Senate and the House employés and also those in the Library. Upon examination we found that we could not get through the whole subject; but upon examining this matter personally I became satisfied that the duties of these assistant librarians were far out of proportion to their salaries as we pay other employés.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then we had better revise the whole list by general law.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is impossible to have a general law. It is simply to do justice in this place that I offer this amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would refer the Chair to page 16 of Barclay's Digest, and especially to the latter clause of the first paragraph on that page.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This amendment is not germane to this paragraph, at any rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph of Barclay's Digest relating to this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.—Rule 120. It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to the general appropriation bill which changes an existing law.—Journal, 1, 38, pages 598, 599. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this amendment does not reduce the salary of any person, but proposes to increase it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it germane to a clause relating to the Joint Committee on the Library?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire if the officers named in the amendment have any connection with the expenditure of the money appropriated by the pending paragraph?

Mr. GARFIELD. The officers named in the clause are members of this House and the Senate—a Committee on the Library, as they are called, just as another committee is called the Committee on the Judiciary. But if we had before us an appropriation for the Committee on the Judiciary, it would hardly be in order, I take it, to increase the salaries of the judges as germane to such a clause.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have offered the amendment at this time because we have here a distinct provision in reference to the Library. Of course if the point of order is well taken, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that upon the ground that the amendment is not germane to the subject, the point of order will lie. But whether a proposition to increase the compensation of these officers would be in order upon another part of the bill is another question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand the point of order to be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order withdrawn?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by adding to the pending paragraph the following:

Provided, That there be constituted a council upon matters of art, to be named by the Joint Committee on the Library, consisting of five persons accomplished in such matters, to whom shall be submitted, in connection with said committee, all designs and proposals for paintings or statues ordered by Congress, a majority of whom, in connection with said committee, shall decide as well upon the artist to be selected as upon the subject-matter of such designs or proposals, except when otherwise expressed in the law authorizing the same; and that no compensation be attached to such service, except the ordinary expenses of going to and from Washington, to be allowed by the Committee on the Library, according to such rules as they may prescribe.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must make a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. FRYE. It is new legislation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think that Congress is perfectly competent to manage affairs in this Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX. I move then to amend the pending paragraph by striking out $15,000 and inserting $10,000. I will say that the amendment which I just offered was not intended of course as any reproach upon the distinguished gentlemen of the Committee on the Library, who have charge of the decoration of the Capitol. That amendment is substantially the same as a bill which I introduced last session when we were voting large amounts of money for statuary, &c. The principal difference is that my bill named five artists; and there, perhaps, was my mistake; otherwise the measure might have carried. It was criticised everywhere on the ground mainly that I named artists for this commission. If I had named perhaps such men as Mr. Perkins, of Boston, men of leisure and taste, men not engaged practically as painters or sculptors, I think it very likely that my bill would have received more favorable consideration.

But, Mr. Chairman, no one can visit this Capitol without seeing the need of some improvement in respect to its decoration. Unless you want to have here some day a bonfire of all the elements of art which are incongruously heaped together in this Capitol, we had better provide, and that soon, a commission to determine these matters according to the best canons of artistic criticism. All true friends of art, all men of good taste, ought to welcome a measure of the kind I have proposed. My bill of last session was received with approval by the newspapers in Boston, in Cincinnati, in New York, by various art journals—by almost everybody except members of Congress.

Now, sir, I do not know exactly where we can find our best artists; but I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from a western paper. There may be lying in abeyance somewhere in the West some artist like the one described in this paragraph, who may be selected some day to do honor to this Capitol by such a piece of work as is suggested. The article which I ask the Clerk to read is the only commentary I have to make on the decoration of this Capitol.

The Clerk read as follows:

A father procured an outfit of oil-paints and brushes for his eight-year-old son the other day, the lad having developed a talent for drawing. Little was seen of the boy for two or three days, and then he took his father and mother by the hand and led them into the parlor, and triumphantly pointed to the proof of his artistic skill. The gilt paper on the walls formed a fine groundwork for him, and he had painted a horse over one door, a lion over another, a bird over the third, and at intervals along the wall he had brought out fighting-dogs, ships, fire-engines, Indians in full dress, and bears chasing boys. He had put a new border on the bay-window curtains, striped the legs of the piano, and had proceeded to touch up and improve certain chromos and oil-paintings hanging on the walls. Father and mother gazed around, and the young artist anxiously waited for them to pat him on the head and say they were proud of such a son. The father placed the son's ear between his thumb and finger, and led him through several rooms to the woodshed, and what followed may be inferred from a remark by the boy, and overheard by a pedestrian: "O, father, let up on me, and I'll never be an artist any more, unless I am selected by Congress to paint the father of my country for the Capitol."

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchasing Miss Ransom's painting of Major-General George H. Thomas on the Battle-Field of Chickamauga, $10,000.

Mr. CLYMER. I make the point of order that this is an appropriation for an expenditure not previously authorized by law, and should therefore be ruled out.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule which was read a few minutes ago, providing that an appropriation for carrying on any Department, or any work begun in any Department of the Government, is in order.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is this a work for "carrying on any Department of the Government?"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] makes the point of order that this paragraph contemplates an appropriation not authorized by law. The Chair inquires of the gentleman having charge of the bill whether he can refer to any law authorizing an appropriation to be made for this particular purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no special law providing for this or any other particular piece of art; but, under the general rule the Chair had read a few moments ago, any purchase for the decoration of the Capitol or any one of the Departments of the Government, like the paintings on the right and left of the Speaker, the picture of Washington or Lafayette——

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Who selects these paintings?

Mr. GARFIELD. All these decorations and paintings now here have required appropriations made precisely as in this instance.

Mr. CLEMENTS. This certainly ought to be obnoxious to the point of order, as it is obnoxious to everything else.

Mr. GARFIELD. This subject was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clear in his own mind what his ruling ought to be.

Mr. CLYMER. If the Chair has any doubt upon the subject, I should like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] raises the point of order that the appropriation in this paragraph is not contemplated by any law, and therefore out of order in this bill. The Chair considers the point of order well taken, and therefore rules the appropriation out.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that I have never heard any ruling like that in this House on any question before it.

Mr. THOMPSON. In my judgment the ruling could not be otherwise, and the Chair has maintained his own dignity and the credit of the House by making it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is contrary to every precedent, as every one who knows anything about the business of the House must confess.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made his ruling and there is only one thing left, and that is to take an appeal.

The Clerk read as follows:

To purchase Carpenter's picture of the Reading of the Emancipation Proclamation, $25,000.

Mr. FRYE. I raise the same point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this also contemplates an appropriation not required by any law, and he therefore sustains the point of order and rules out the paragraph from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of rooms on the second and third floors of house numbered 1930, at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Twentieth street, from November 1, 1874, to June 30, 1876, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, $1,666.66, to be paid from the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the northern boundary commission, in which service the rooms are occupied. And the remaining balance of said appropriation, namely, the appropriation made by act of June 11, 1874, with the portion aforesaid, is hereby continued and rendered available for the purpose for which it was originally intended, to complete the office-work.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that, and especially in regard to the last sentence, that it is not in contemplation of any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair everrules the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to insert after the word "intended" in line 380, in the last of that paragraph, the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I now move to go back to line 339.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to return to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, due from the United States, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $1,060,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Now I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That from this appropriation the Treasury of the United States shall be reimbursed in the following sum for amounts paid by the United States for the District, $97,740.50 paid by act of April 18, 1874, for school-teachers of the District.

The Delegate admits the government of the District is bound to reimburse the Government for whatever advances it has made, and I see no good reason why that reimbursement should not be provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. CHIPMAN. If the gentleman will allow me I will finish my statement.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The reimbursement here referred to the law provided should be made by a tax levy, and the gentleman can accomplish his purpose by providing for that levy without disturbing the fund which is necessary to keep our schools in motion for the next fiscal year, beginning on the 1st of July next. If the gentleman's amendment prevails there will only be the number of children kept out of the public schools which that amount would keep in. I do not believe, however, that he desires to accomplish any such result.

And now that I have the ear of the committee I wish to repeat what I have heretofore said to the House, that while Congress at its various sessions since the Government was founded has given to the public schools in other States and Territories throughout the country over a hundred million acres of the public lands, and over thirty million dollars, it has not yet given to the District of Columbia one dollar until this appropriation was made, and then on the condition a tax should be levied to reimburse the Government. While these munificent grants have been made in support of schools all over the country, not one has been made to this District——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I must resume the floor.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Let me finish.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. You will consume all of my time. I wish to say that the simple question presented here is whether this amount shall be donated to this District or not.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That is not the question at all. Let the gentleman make provision by levying a tax as the law contemplated. You have destroyed the local government here and have not established any other to take its place.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to the point of order that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is new legislation. The money to which this amendment refers as having been advanced to this District by the Government was advanced on this condition: that it should be reimbursed by a tax levied for that purpose. This amendment does not provide for any such tax in this District, but an entirely different mode of reimbursement. It is therefore a change of the law.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It does not change the law. The law provides for reimbursement to the Government, and in contemplation of the law this sum was to be deducted out of any appropriation made toward carrying on government in this District.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's amendment is clearly in contravention of existing law as far as reimbursement is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the law provides for the reimbursement of this money by a levy of tax for that purpose upon this District, while the gentleman from Iowa moves to deduct this amount from an appropriation toward the expenses of the District. The point of order is made that the amendment changes existing law. The Chair, as at present advised in reference to the law by the chairman of the committee and by other gentlemen, sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I presume it would be in order to move to reduce the appropriation that amount.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we cannot go back to the paragraph except for the amendment which has just been ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the paragraph was passed unconditionally, and if the gentleman from Iowa desires to offer another amendment he may do so.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to reduce this amount, "$1,060,000," by this amount of $97,740.50.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair if he referred to the existing law before making his decision? The law was passed at my instance, and as it passed the House, unless I am greatly mistaken, it provided that the reimbursement should be made in the way the amendment proposed; that is, that it should be deducted from the appropriation made by Congress. That certainly was as it was originally proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was informed upon the point of order, by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and by other gentlemen, that the law of last year contemplated that the reimbursement should be made by assessment, and not by deducting from appropriations, and on that statement he made his ruling. If that is not the fact, his ruling would of course be withdrawn.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The Chair was entirely right. I have placed the statute in the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] who can state how it is.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I find that the Chair was correctly informed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] to reduce the appropriation by the sum of $97,740.50.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I desire to complete what I was saying a little while ago. I have stated to the committee that this Government had expended for public schools elsewhere than in the District large amounts of money, and had contributed large amounts of public land. In addition to that, I wish to say to the committee, while we are doing all we can to support a system of public schools in this District, paying about $400,000 a year for that purpose, but two-thirds of the pupils who attend these schools are the children of people who belong to the District and pay taxes in the District.

A report of the board of trustees, which I believe has become a public document, having been transferred to the House by the President, says that one-third of the pupils in our public schools are the children of Government employés whose local domicile is out of the District, and who reside here simply as servants of the Government. And another third of these pupils are the children of colored people who have been compelled to seek shelter at various periods of the war and since the war in the District, where they received from the laws of the country such protection as was not given them by the States from which they came.

Now I claim that it is not right that we should be compelled to bear the entire burden of expense for this system of school education here at the capital. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] is practically to throw that entire burden upon us. We do not seek to exclude any class of children, whether they are children of employés of the Government or children of the colored people or of any other class who do not contribute to our taxes. The public schools should be as free as air. We are making extraordinary exertions to sustain a public-school system here by expending on it $400,000 a year. Yet there are now in this District to-day over twelve thousand children of school age who cannot get into the public schools because we have not money to pay the teachers and have not money to provide shelter for the children. These are some of the reasons why I think the gentleman's amendment should not prevail.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to say to the gentleman from the District that I am sick and tired of their getting money out of the Treasury indirectly. I would rather they would come and ask the Government to give them the money at once instead of asking Congress to give them so much money, promising to repay it by a tax. In this instance they came and told us they could not pay these teachers; but that if we would make an appropriation they would collect by taxes and repay us the amount.

Mr. CHIPMAN. We made no such pledge.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is the condition embodied in the law.

Mr. CHIPMAN. It was the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] not ours.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We gave them to pay their teachers that money which comes from the people of the country elsewhere, who educate their own children and pay their own teachers. I do not desire to do injustice to the people of this District. I am willing that the Government of the United States should do its full share in the way of paying the expenses of the District. But when they come here and get from Congress the entire amount necessary to pay their teachers for the whole winter, $97,000, and then refuse or neglect to pay that back to the Treasury as required by law, I do not see that they show any desire to act justly by the United States.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The trouble is that the government of the District was destroyed.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not understand the gentleman from the District to deny that the Government of the United States by the act of last winter paid the whole cost of the school-teachers of the District for the entire winter.

Mr. CHIPMAN. It was to supply a deficiency and not to pay for any particular period of time. It was to pay a number of salaries then due, and not the expenses of last winter. That was practically to pay them salaries then due, and not the expenses of this last winter.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. A fund was appropriated for the payment of the teachers.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That went to the payment of the teachers' salaries already due, which by reason of the distresses of the government of the District had not been paid, and it has not been paid back because the government which was directed to collect the tax was destroyed.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. No, the government was not destroyed; it had a successor.

Mr. CONGER. I am very sorry that economy is proposed in regard to the matter of the public schools, and I desire that the gentleman from Iowa, who is generally in favor of keeping public faith, should not favor this proposition to pay the school-teachers of the District.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no State in all the Northwest, not one of those States, that has received such magnificent donations for its public schools as has the State of Iowa. I believe there was not a single section of the one hundred thousand sections given to the State of Iowa for educational purposes that was not good and valuable land. One section out of every thirty-six sections in that State was given to the government of that State for school purposes, and the gentleman from Iowa knows what is the condition of affairs here. At the last session we were informed on reliable authority that all the teachers of this District, male and female, who had been serving for months in educating the white and colored children of this District had been laboring for nothing; that they were poor and needy and had rendered services for which they had not been paid, and the appeal was made to Congress to advance for the District money that would pay them and keep them from starvation; and Congress very properly advanced the money to pay those teachers' salaries, provided that they should hereafter be paid by a tax on the property of the District.

Now, sir, in the multiform changes which Congress has made in the government of this District in the exercise of its sole power to legislate over the District, so far that the tax has not been raised and paid, and now the gentleman rises and asks that the appropriation shall be whittled down to the lowest possible sum in keeping the faith of the government of the District, and that this particular item of $87,000 for the teachers shall be deducted from the appropriation. The result of that would be that that portion of the appropriation of $1,000,000 which goes to pay the teachers' salaries must necessarily fall short, and the white and colored children of the District will be deprived of teachers. Let economy, in God's name, in this District fall somewhere else than on the children of the District so as to leave them to grow up in ignorance and crime because the means of education are not furnished to them.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE; and on a division there were ayes 12, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the paragraph beginning on line 350, on which a point of order was raised by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who had charge of that paragraph, is now present.

The Clerk read the paragraph, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to repay Jacob Parmenter, of Plattsburgh, New York, the amount paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment rendered against him for an official act as collector of customs for the district of Champlain, $684.10.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to state that a bill was passed making an appropriation which was intended to cover the costs and expenses of the judgment recovered against the collector of the district of Champlain, New York, in an action brought against him for his action in the performance of a duty. By inadvertence only an appropriation was made for the costs and not the expenses. This appropriation is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the explanation of the gentleman from New York the Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken and does not lie against the paragraph.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For rent of fire-proof building (except the portion used for standard weights and measures) for the safe-keeping and preservation of the original astronomical, magnetic, hydrographic, and other records; the original topographical and hydrographic maps and charts; the engraved plates, instruments, and other valuable articles of the Coast Survey, $5,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some explanation of that clause, and I move pro forma to strike it out for the purpose of making a statement. By the previous paragraph we have appropriated for the rent of the building that was constructed three or four years ago, and constructed properly, for the benefit of the Coast Survey, and that building was then deemed to be fully large enough for the purposes of the Coast Survey. Since that there have been erected three houses on Capitol Hill, one of which I presume cost from forty-five to fifty thousand dollars. That house is convenient to the Coast Survey, and the Coast Survey, notwithstanding the fact that a building was erected sufficient to accommodate the service as they thought at the time for all time or certainly for a large period of time, asks here provision for the rent of another building, as this paragraph shows, although it does not state what it is for definitely, and if I had not made some inquiries I should never have found out what this building was for. But there is another clause a little further on in the bill to which I want to direct the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Having found the fact out that this is $5,000 for this building, I find a further appropriation a few paragraphs ahead as follows:

And for workshops in building 205 South New Jersey avenue—

Mark you, that is the same building—

four hundred dollars; and for rent of fire-proof rooms in the same building, $1,000.

So that actually we have this house rented at about $6,400 a year. I do not know that that is a high rent. I take it that the building cost—the gentleman is present here who owns it and he can tell us—I suppose the building cost from forty-five to fifty thousand dollars at the outside.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. How much?

Mr. RANDALL. From forty-five to fifty thousand dollars, so that the rent is about 12 per cent. on the cost. I do not want to attack that, because every man gets as much rent as he can for his own houses. But I want to make this point against the necessity for renting this building at all: The Coast Survey had a building constructed which was supposed to be adequate for all their purposes, and I believe it is adequate for all their purposes. If it was not out of order, perhaps I might suggest that I do not believe this building ever would have been rented if it had not been owned by some man of power and influence.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this paragraph. I should expect with confidence to have his vote in favor of it after he has heard the exact facts. It is quite true, as he says, that there was a building erected some years since for the Coast Survey; it also is true that it was amply large enough for the workshops and officers of that branch of the public service.

About two and a half years ago the then superintendent of the Coast Survey came to me—I had bought the land at auction—next north of the Coast Survey building, at a sale ordered by the court; and he asked me if I would be willing to sell a portion of the land, which I had bought, for the use of the Coast Survey, if Congress would buy it. I told him that I preferred not to sell it, as I had bought it for the purpose of erecting a block of buildings on it. He said that a part of the Coast Survey building had been on fire; that he did not deem it fire-proof.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to correct you right there. The main building is all fire-proof; the rear of it is not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I still think I am correct. The superintendent said to me, "I am greatly troubled; I have two and a half million dollars' worth of copper-plates and drawings, all that have been made since the foundation of the Government, all our notes of measurement, and all there is of our original surveys. If I lose them by fire, they cannot be replaced; insurance will do no good even if we receive the value of them. Now, if you are going to erect a building on this land next to us will you let somebody construct a portion of the building entirely fire-proof for the purpose of storing the immensely valuable property beyond the reach of fire." The application was afterward put in writing. I said, "If it is desired, I will permit a portion of the building to be made fire-proof for that purpose." He inquired what the rent would be, and I said: "As it is a special erection, to be made wholly of brick, stone, and iron, the doors, window-shutters, and everything else to be absolutely fire-proof, and in case the Government does not keep it in their use—and they can only be bound during the pleasure of Congress—nobody else will be likely to want such a building in such a place. I think there should be paid about 12 per cent. on the actual cost in the way of rental." He said that I must limit the cost not to exceed $50,000, including the land. I replied, "Very well; the architect says it can be erected for that sum." And the bargain was concluded by the correspondence on these terms.

It was agreed to be a three-story building, so as to give room to work on the plates and papers in the same building in which they were stored, so they might not be injured by carrying them about. When I came to erect the rest of the block buildings, I concluded to make it a four-story building; so I said to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, "I suppose if I make that a four-story building in order to secure harmony in the whole structure, and make it just as fire-proof as I was to make the three-story building and let you have it all, you will have no objection?" He said, "No; if we do not have to pay rent or a cost over $50,000." Relying on this contract, the building was then erected and the bills and vouchers for it were all to be submitted to the Architect of the Treasury Department, and it was to be made fire-proof to his satisfaction, that being a part of the agreement. It cost, with the upper story and a fire-proof arched roof of iron, $58,000 besides the land; the whole cost, including the land, at a fair valuation, was about $65,000. An agreement was made that it should be an entirely fire-proof structure. It is certified to be the best fire-proof structure that has ever been erected in this city, or I think in any other. Such is the exact history of the transaction. What can be alleged against its propriety, advantage to the Government, economy, or fairness?

Another object of making the building was to have kept in safety and to be an insurance on the standard weights and measures, on all the copper-plates of the original surveys of the Government, amounting in commercial value to $2,500,000. It is much better than any policy. It is an absolute insurance. All the walls were built hollow, twenty-two inches thick, and built so as to be absolutely fire-proof. It is let for $6,000; the $400 is for a part of another building, perhaps for a small building that somebody else has.

Mr. RANDALL. On the same lot?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; not on the lot of the fire-proof building at all. If it is for the rent of the other building it is for another below that, a little building like a safe down below. I have now given the reason why this fire-proof building was erected.

Being fully aware that there was a law against any member of Congress making any contract with the Government, and knowing that this would probably be the subject of criticism, therefore I took care not to make one. That is exactly what has been done. I do not own that portion of the building. I wish I did. I went into the matter simply at the request of the Coast Survey to aid the public service. The party who owns the fire-proof building, out of the 12 per cent. rent must pay 3 per cent. taxes and will not make much of a gain by the transaction, especially when we consider the uncertainty of the lease.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know of any difference between a man owning the property and giving the money for its erection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me, sir; I did not do that. If such had been the case there would have been no difference at all. The only thing I shall have given toward the construction of the building is the attention necessary to see that it conforms to the rest of the block, and that the structure conforms to the contract by being absolutely fire-proof.

Now, for that $6,000 the Government gets absolute insurance of property worth over $2,500,000, besides saving all the original cost of the structure. How small a percentage of insurance that is any one can see—a little over 2 mills per cent. The papers connected with the matter are all spread upon the records of the Treasury Department. It being foreseen that the transaction would be attacked, it was intended to be a matter that would stand every test of economy and propriety.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not attack so much the gentleman from Massachusetts as the Coast Survey, that hunt up people with whom to make contracts to erect buildings to be rented at the extravagant rate of 12 per cent. interest upon the cost of erection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As to whether the rate is extravagant, I will ask the gentleman whether he or anybody else would erect a building of a special character, adapted to the wants of but a single customer, (so that if that customer should not occupy it, it would be of no special value to anybody else,) and would rent it on a lease of ten years for less than 12 per cent. and pay 3 per cent. taxes out of that.

Mr. RANDALL. If I had the money, I should be glad to erect any sort of buildings whatever and rent them at a very less rate of interest than 12 per cent. I do not believe there is any property in the center of any city which, unless under very rare and peculiar circumstances, will bring as rent 12 per cent. interest upon the amount invested in the building.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I answer that no man would for a moment think of erecting a building of a given character, suited to the wants of but one person, a building which would cost many thousands of dollars to alter for the occupancy of others, and rent that building for a less rate upon the amount of the investment for a short term, as in this case. I certainly would not; and it would not have been done by the person who owns it except to have the money invested in a perfectly safe investment.

Mr. RANDALL. Only the other night I showed that property in this District, by reason of taxation, was bringing but 1½ per cent. return upon its value. The gentleman will mark the great difference between 1½ and 12 per cent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would suggest that the taxes have to be deducted from the rent.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask my colleague a question in connection with this matter, because it is one the history of which has been discussed a great deal. I dare say my colleague may be able to explain it satisfactorily. I wish to inquire whether, before this lease had been executed between him and the Coast Survey, there was pending the provision prohibiting the making of any contract of this kind by any Department of the Government. I have no personal knowledge about this matter; but I have heard a story about it. My colleague has removed half of the objection; and I call his attention to this point with great frankness, that he may remove the other half.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very much obliged to my colleague for the question. The contract for erecting this building was made more than a year—I think a year and a half—before that provision was considered in Congress. The building was already up. The lease was made in pursuance of the contract when the building was supposed to be ready to be occupied. It was expected to be ready in the summer; but unfortunately the parties who had charge of making the fire-proof shutters and some of the iron work were unable to carry out their contracts for ninety days; so that the actual occupation did not take place until some three months after it was expected to be ready for occupancy and after the lease was expected to take effect. The contract under which the building was erected was made a year and a half before.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That answers the point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, it is an unfair criticism of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]—I know he would not do anything unfair if he knew it—it is an unfair criticism to say that the Coast Survey went about to "hunt up" somebody to make such a building. There was no other land vacant on which such a building could be built, adjacent to the Coast Survey building, save this, where its occupation would not be very inconvenient and troublesome.

Mr. RANDALL. I make that criticism because of the fact that this same Coast Survey, after contracting with another person for the erection of a Government building which should be for a series of years entirely adequate to the expected requirements of the Coast Survey, and when a part of the building thus erected for the use of the Government is occupied as a private residence for persons connected with the Coast Survey, goes to work and hunts up some one else from whom to rent other property for the use of the Coast Survey. Now, I maintain that instead of appropriating a portion of the Coast Survey building as the private residence of one of the officers, such use of any part of that building should have been discontinued, so that it would not have been necessary to rent any other building for the business of the Coast Survey.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, there are two mistakes under which the gentleman is laboring. First, he assumes that a part of the Coast Survey building is used as a private residence. That is not so.

Mr. RANDALL. Has it not been so used? It may not be now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to finish my statement. It has not been so used under the present head of the Coast Survey.

Mr. RANDALL. It was under Professor Pierce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The former Superintendent of the Coast Survey and all previous Superintendents, as I am advised, have had quarters furnished by the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me right here to ask this question: Was not a part of the Coast Survey building occupied as a private residence when the contract with the gentleman from Massachusetts was made?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; but the difference (which my friend will appreciate) is this: What the Coast Survey seeks to secure by renting this building is, not more room to live in or to work in, but to obtain, as it does in this way, an absolutely fire-proof structure in which to preserve the public property; the other building is joined right on to a very inflammable structure; and attention had been called to the matter by the fact that there had been a fire in some part of the building.

The CHAIRMAN. This proceeding is all irregular.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will now have a vote on this.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my amendment. If we have rented this building, we ought to pay for it; but I hope some one else will see to the necessity of looking into that feature of the contract which binds this Government for ten years.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no contract which binds the Government for ten years. On the contrary, there was put into the contract by the Coast Survey a limitation that it applied only for one year, unless Congress chooses to protect further the public property from fire.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vessels for the Coast Survey: For construction, equipment, and outfit of one schooner, of about seventy-two feet in length, for the observation of currents along and off the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, $16,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike that out in order that the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, may tell us what this appropriation is for, and what necessity there is for this work. This provides for the construction, equipment, and outfit of one schooner about seventy-two feet in length for the observation of currents along and off the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. That is entirely new, it seems to me, to this Coast Survey. I should be glad if the gentleman would tell us what reason there is for incorporating this appropriation in the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is for carrying on the ordinary work of the Coast Survey.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit that this does not belong to the ordinary work of the Coast Survey. It is for the observation of the currents off and along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and that certainly has nothing to do with the Coast Survey. Why, too, is it necessary to construct and fit out a new vessel for this purpose? It seems to me that this is a work aggrandizing the Coast Survey; it is striking out in a new direction, altogether in another line of work.

Now, I have been of the opinion for many years, and I will take this opportunity to repeat that opinion in the presence of the present head of the Navy Department, that this Coast Survey should be under the direction of the Navy Department. It properly belongs to it, and especially this work. The observation of currents off and along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts belongs to the Navy Department if it belongs anywhere. It does not belong certainly to the Treasury Department. It is wholly disconnected with commerce. Unless there is something which I do not appreciate just now, I should be unwilling to launch out into a broader and wider range of labor anywhere.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is exactly in the line of appropriations made for years past. It is simply to replace a vessel wearing out and almost worn out which has been for a long time in the same service. If the gentleman from Tennessee will refer to the book of estimates, page 173, covering some eighteen pages, he will find a very full account of the work of the Coast Survey of the United States and especially in regard to the vessels engaged in that service. The superintendent stated that in 1858 all the vessels were comparatively new, none being then over nine years old, while in 1874 there were twelve from eighteen to twenty-five years old, rotten, worn out, worthless, and utterly valueless for any use, thus reducing the available number to nineteen, compared with the number of thirty-four in 1858. He then goes on to state the special need he has for new vessels, and asks us to give a great many more than we have provided. We have only given one-third of the number he asks for.

We have not enlarged the scope of the Coast Survey, but on the contrary have reduced it. We limited the appropriation asked for this year, and we have last year limited it by not allowing the work of the Coast Survey to be extended into Alaska. The observation of currents along and off the coast has been almost from the beginning a part of the Coast Survey.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I should be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or somebody else had been prepared to have spoken more specifically on this subject than he has done. The Coast Survey has been running now for sixty years. We had assurance years and years ago it should be soon brought to a conclusion; that is to say, that the coasts of the United States were to be surveyed and we were to have charts which would be supplied to navigators who sailed along our coasts or entered our harbors. We have made appropriations from year to year, but as far as my observation has gone we are to-day as far from the end as when we begun. So far from having charts with which to navigate our own coasts, I have myself sailed (and not much of my life has been spent on the water) along our own coast upon a steamer navigated by a chart from the English admiralty, and to my recollection there was not a Coast Survey chart on board. I should like to know, as those interested in maritime affairs I have no doubt would like to know, when this great work is to be completed, or whether it is one of those things never to be accomplished, "to be still beginning, never ending; still pursuing, never finding."

Mr. GARFIELD. Last year when the appropriations for the Coast Survey were before the committee, I put the same question to the superintendent, and he said it would take twenty years at the present rate to complete the coast survey. I am surprised that a gentleman like the gentleman from Tennessee, who is so much in favor of this class of work, should speak as if the work accomplished there by the Coast Survey has been of but little value.

I believe we have no work of a scientific character connected with this Government of which we have so much right to be proud as the work of the Coast Survey. They have completed already their share of the northern lakes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thought the Army had charge of the northern lakes.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; they have charge of Lake Champlain. They have completed the survey of the northern part of the Atlantic coast mainly. They have extended the survey largely on the southern Atlantic coast, where they could do nothing during the war, and on the Gulf coast, and the Pacific coast. They have been engaged on the latter only a little while, but they are going on connecting the geodetic points of the interior of the various States so that we can have the two coasts connected by points observed and calculated. They now tell us that about twenty years will finish the whole work, and I believe they are doing it about as thoroughly and substantially as it can be done. It is not a thing to be rushed through in a year or in several years; but whenever it is done it should be done once for all, so that it may remain fixed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by striking out "$16,000" and inserting "$15,000." I do so for the purpose of saying that I do not underestimate the importance of surveying our coast. What I complain of is that after three-quarters of a century we have so little done. The very same assurances that are given now by the gentleman from Ohio were given still more emphatically forty years ago by the then head of the Coast Survey, and yet we are still just as far apparently from results now as we were then.

What we complain of in regard to this Coast Survey is that it is seeking to install itself as a barnacle upon this Government, as something to go on from year to year, from generation to generation, as a permanent thing that is always to be done and never to be finished. I am reminded by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that there is here something like $150,000 for new work—I believe $144,000. Therefore I think that instead of being a separate establishment, which is practically dependent on nobody, with nobody to oversee it, or even to see that they make the annual reports which the law calls upon and requires them to make, it should be attached to the Navy Department and made directly amenable to its supervision.

I had occasion some three or four years ago to examine a report which the law requires to be made by the Coast Survey. I could find it nowhere in our document-room. I sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he knowing nothing about it, sent to the Coast Survey, and I had a manuscript copy sent me with a statement I believe that the matter had been entirely overlooked. This thing is being run without any supervision, without anybody practically to look after it, and as it goes on it swells up year after year growing larger and larger, with results that do not in my judgment compare with the cost the Government is at. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph.

For construction, equipment, and outfit of two schooners, of about eighty-five feet in length, for inshore work of all kinds along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, to replace old and worthless vessels, each at $20,000, $40,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 456 strike out "two schooners" and insert "one schooner;" and in lines 459 and 460, strike out "each at" and "$40,000."

As has been stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, there is here a large amount of new work provided for. I do not believe that this is the time for the Government to enter upon new work; and if the committee think that it is, I suggest as a compromise here to build one vessel instead of two.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are six new vessels provided for in these appropiations.

Mr. GARFIELD. They asked for thirteen vessels, and we have cut the number down.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For construction, equipment, and outfit of two small steamers, of about eighty feet in length, for inshore work of all kinds on the coast of Louisiana and other parts of the Gulf coast, each at $17,000, $34,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by striking out "two" and inserting "one," and by striking out "$34,000."

It is not pretended that this is for replacing old vessels. It is for the construction of absolutely new vessels. We have already provided for three, and I think one small steamer for the work on the coast of Louisiana and other parts on the Gulf coast will be sufficient. I hope the appropriation for one of these steamers will be stricken out.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For construction, equipment, and outfit of one small steamer for inshore coast hydrography on the Pacific coast, $55,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the chairman of the Appropriation Committee explain the reason of the cost varying so much? Two vessels at $17,000 are provided for inshore work on the coast of Louisiana, and one small steamer for inshore work on the Pacific coast is to cost $55,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course for in-shore work on the Gulf of Mexico there is not required so large a steamer as is required in the open sea on the Pacific coast.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of nine hundred and seventy-five light-house keepers and light-beacon keepers and their assistants, $585,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman who has charge of this bill to the various items of the light-house establishment. In the first item there is an increase of $20,000, and in the various paragraphs relating to that service an increase of $110,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Yes, that is so; and it arises from the fact that every year, Mr. Chairman, we build new light-houses and put in new keepers and new assistants and thereby extend the establishments, and the whole cost in reference to the salaries and expenses of the light-house establishment is increased. This increase to which the gentleman refers, I will state to him, relates to what we did last year and the year before in putting on additional service; but I will state to him that that portion of the bill which relates to the structure of new light-houses is much smaller than last year, and, with the exception of a few exposed points on the Atlantic coast and on the great lakes, the committee have not proposed the construction of new light-houses, because they believe that this is a year in which work of that sort can wait.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me just give you the figures. The amount is $316,440.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman's figures are correct, but the reason I have already given why these items are increased.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that by unanimous consent we pass over all these clauses in relation to light-houses and the light-house establishment and pass on to the appropriations in relation to the public lands, for few of us understand anything about this light-house establishment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection of course to that being done, but there are one or two amendments which I am instructed by the committee to offer to that portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee can only be accepted by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOOD. I think we had better proceed with the bill in the regular way.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Steam-tender for seventh district: For building a small steamer for use in construction and repairs in the seventh light-house district, $50,000.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to strike out that clause. I am told by one of the ablest officers in the Light-House Board that they have as many vessels now engaged in the service of that Board as they need. These vessels are of the most expensive description, and they cannot be sold when put up at public sale for half what they cost. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will explain why they are necessary. There are but six hundred light-houses on the coast of the United States, and four hundred of these are upon the inland waters and can be just as well attended to by a steamer costing $10,000 as by one costing $50,000. They tell me at the office of the Light-House Board they have now plenty of steamers. I wish the gentleman would tell us how many steamers the Light-House Board has now in service.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Light-House Board has a steamer for every district.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. How many in all?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know the whole number.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there are thirteen in all.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then there are two for each district. I am safe in saying that there are over twenty steamers now employed by that board, and I will warrant that any board of officers, either of the Engineer Corps or of the Light-House Board, would say that that number is quite sufficient. I have been told by officers of the Light-House board that they have plenty now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Light-House Board has been in operation for many years; it unfortunately is the fact the materials in that service, as in all others, will wear out. For some years I have known something about the light-house appropriation. We have often made appropriation for new tenders and light-house ships, for of course they grow old and have to be replaced.

Now, as to this particular appropriation, I would state that the testimony given by members of the board before the committee and the statements that were made and the papers given to us showed that they need these ships in order to do their work faithfully. Light-houses have to be visited frequently; stores have to be carried and inspections made; there are a thousand and one things which are required to be done. A light-house vessel is as much needed as a light-house, and if you strike out the one you should strike out the other. You cannot keep up the one without the other.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. How are they kept now? There are appropriations here for three tenders, and they are scattered all along through the bill; they do not come together. There is one here on this page, one on the next page, and one on the page after.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. For the reason that they are for different districts. The Light-House Board in making up their estimates begin on the Atlantic coast, and come down along it and along the Gulf coast, and then cross over and go along up the Pacific coast. The items are given in the natural geographical order. When they come to a district which requires an appropriation, they put in the estimate. When they come to another district, if it has any wants, they are cared for. When they come to a district on the Pacific coast, its wants are cared for. It is not because, as the gentleman seems to think, they do not want us to see the items all together, but it is because the lines of the coast and the districts in their order are estimated for.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the last word. In the last few days the papers inform us that one of our light-houses in distress hailed a naval vessel passing by, and upon the vessel going there it was found that it was blocked up by ice, &c., so that ever since some time in December the keeper had been reduced to great distress. Assuming that statement to be correct—and the narrative seems to be well founded and entitled to credence—I would ask you how such a thing could happen, and the light-house not be visited by such vessels as we are proposing here to provide; how the keeper of this light-house and his wife could be left there so long without receiving the assistance they needed?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Just as it happens now and then that a man, woman, or child will be caught out in inclement weather and frozen to health. It is not a common occurrence, but such may be the condition of the elements, of the sea, the wind, and the tide, that it will sometimes happen that no communication can be obtained. I know of an instance that happened not long ago on the coast of my own State. There was a light-house on a rock some twenty or twenty-five miles from the main land, a very important light to a large part of the commercial traffic from Europe. The light-keeper was there without communication with the main land for five weeks, having no communication from the shore or from any light-ship, because it so happened that it was impossible to make a landing there. The light-house was built away out at sea on a rock, and it was only possible to land there with certain conditions of wind and water. The poor man was there without communication with the main land for five or six weeks. I presume the case referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] was something like that case.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I want to say, as I have said before, that out of the six hundred light-houses in the United States, four hundred of them are on the rivers and lakes and can be supplied and fitted by steamers which will cost not over $10,000 each.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It is that only about two hundred light-houses in the United States are on the sea-coast; four hundred of them are on the lakes and rivers.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman does not mean to say that upon the lakes and rivers there are four hundred of what would be strictly called light-house structures?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. That is exactly what I say; they are not; they are nothing but beacon-lights; but they tell you that there are six hundred light-houses in the United States.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The lights for the western rivers, as the gentleman very well knows, are not elaborate structures costing very much money. But navigation there is obstructed, and needs assistance, and it is helped by these little beacon-lights, that need watchers or keepers. They reckon up in the list, but they are not expensive structures. I may say that the work that has been done has not been expensive; that the lights on the rivers are of great value, but they are not expensive structures as they are elsewhere.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. That is true; but you make it cost the same for a steamer to go and supply them.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I can see how a steamer visiting the small lights might for a year have no occasion to visit very many of the expensive structures.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. That is what I object to. I say these little light-houses can be supplied by building small inland steamers cheaper far than these extra ocean steamers that cost $50,000. I hope this paragraph will be stricken out.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let us have a vote.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For re-establishing range-lights at Eagle Harbor, Lake Superior, $8,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to offer several amendments which come from the Committee on Commerce. Their presentation has been delayed, and they have been omitted from the bill because they were in the hands of Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, lately deceased.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

Insert after the paragraph last read the following:

For the construction of a light-house on Ottawa Point, or for range-lights to guide into Tawas Bay on the northwest shore of Saginaw Bay, in the State of Michigan, to be known as Tawas Light, $30,000.

For erection of range-lights to guide into the cut through the outer bar at the mouth of Saginaw River, in the State of Michigan, and for the construction of a new dwelling-house for the light-house keeper's use, $23,000. And the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board is hereby extended, so that it shall be lawful for said board to lease the necessary ground for the erection and maintenance of said lights.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move also the following amendment, to come in at the end of the printed paragraph last read:

That the portion of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875," approved June 30, 1874, which makes appropriation for the construction of a light-house at the mouth of Thunder Bay River, in the State of Michigan, be so amended that the proviso thereto attached shall read as follows:

Provided, That when the light-house is completed, from that time and thereafter further collections of tolls from vessels and their cargoes entering or clearing from said river are hereby prohibited.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a light-house on Passage Island, Lake Superior, $18,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available until the government of the Dominion of Canada shall build a light-house on Cholchester Reef, at the mouth of Detroit River.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the word "at" in the last line and inserting "to the eastward of."

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest that the various other clauses in the bill pertaining to light-houses be not read, but that any gentleman shall be at liberty to offer amendments to them.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let them all be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. By way of amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] I move to strike out the proviso of the pending clause. I make this motion for the purpose of ascertaining from the gentleman who has charge of the bill the exact meaning of this proviso. Does it mean that we shall wait until the Canadian government has finished its light-house before we erect ours?

Mr. GARFIELD. This is in the way of persuasion to the Canadian government to erect its light-house.

Mr. HUBBELL. I will explain the matter. The Canadian government has been anxious to obtain Passage Island for the sake of establishing a light house, benefiting to a great extent their own commerce. The Light-House Board has for several years favored the erection of a light-house at the mouth of Detroit River; but the only place where it can be erected belongs to the Canadian government. At present a light-ship is kept there at the expense of our own commerce. Now, we are in favor of building the light-house at Passage Island, provided the Canadian goverment will construct a light-house on Cholchester Reef, at the mouth of Detroit River.

Mr. MAYNARD. My inquiry is whether it is contemplated that we shall delay the erection of our light-house until the Canadian government has built its light-house?

Mr. HUBBELL. Certainly; we do not care to have it built before.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HUBBELL was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For light-house on Stannard's Rock, Lake Superior, $200,000.

I have a communication on this subject which I ask to have read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point that this amendment is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] makes the point that this amendment involves an appropriation not already authorized by law, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a remark on the point of order. It seems to me that the point is not good upon this amendment any more than upon any other provision for a light-house that is contained in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Michigan proceeds, the Chair would like to have the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] state upon what he predicates his point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point that there is no law requiring a light-house to be built at that place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman whether any law requires light-houses to be built at all the several places named in the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose so.

Mr. FIELD. The bill contains appropriations for new light-houses at various places.

Mr. GARFIELD. The ruling of the Chair upon a similar point awhile ago would seem to me to require that this amendment be ruled out. If the Government owns any piece of property at the place named in the amendment—if there is any site already purchased or any law requiring the purchase of a site or the building of a light-house here—if any gentleman will affirm that such is the fact, of course I do not insist upon my point.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, there is no law and never has been any authorizing appropriations for any light-house. The only way in which they come properly before us has been where they have been presented in bills referred to the Committee on Commerce providing for appropriations, by the Committee on Commerce examined, and, if thought worthy of being recommended, sent to the Light-House Board for their recommendation, then returned, and, with the indorsement of the Committee on Commerce, sent to the Committee on Appropriations, with estimates, and on that appropriations have been inserted in general appropriation bills. That has been the uniform course pursued heretofore. Added to that is the report of the engineer in charge of the light-house district and the recommendation of the Light-House Board, independent of the action of the committee, being placed in the Book of Estimates, if they have been prepared before that was made out, or recommended separately afterward. That has been the foundation and always has been the foundation of all this class of appropriations. All these recommendations have been made in the same way. This recommendation comes from the Committee on Commerce, with the recommendation of the Light-House Board, an estimate being made for it in the same way in which others have always been made; and therefore the point of order would lie to all the other appropriations in this bill as well as to this.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My observation is in the same direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks from the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan the point of order does not lie.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think ordinarily this is not liable to the point of order; but the ruling of the Chair a while ago would absolutely rule out this and all similar appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. To what particular ruling does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GARFIELD. The ruling, for instance, in reference to a certain appropriation for the purchase of a work of art. There is no law authorizing this any more than there was authorizing that, yet the Chair rules this in and that out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The only reply the Chair has to make to that is that he begs to differ from the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; but I say that both amendments stand upon the same principle, and if one be ruled out both should be ruled out also.

Mr. HUBBELL. Now that the amendment has been declared to be in order, I ask to say a few words on this subject. In the first place I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Light-House Board.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, January 6, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter of December 23, 1874, from Hon. W. A. WHEELER, M. C., chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, transmitting H. R. bill No. 4096, "to provide for the construction of a light-house at Stannard Rock, Lake Superior," and asking to be furnished with such information as will enable the committee to determine the necessity of making the appropriation proposed in the bill.

In reply thereto I have to say that the Light-House Board has recommended that a light be established on this rock in its reports for each of the years 1871, 1872, and 1873, and that it has reiterated its former recommendations in its report for 1874, and urged that immediate steps be taken in the matter, as the cost of the structure will be materially lessened if the expensive plant gathered for the erection of the light-house on Spectacle Reef can be used in the construction of this light-house.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH HENRY,
Chairman.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this Stannard Rock is a bold rock coming up in the center of Lake Superior on the line of traffic of steamers passing through the Lake, and especially steamers going to the head of the Lake. It can only be seen in fair weather, coming up as it does but a few feet above the surface of the water; and in the summer season, owing to the coldness of the water, there are but few days when fogs do not occur, and the only wonder is accidents have not happened long ago.

The reason why so large an appropriation is asked as $200,000 is because this rock is out some distance in the lake and there is no use of attempting this work at all unless Congress would give such a sum as will warrant the Light-House Board in going on efficiently. By appropriating $200,000 for doing this work at this time a large amount will in the end be saved to the Government. The work has to be done sooner or later, and it can be done now more cheaply than at any other time. A few years ago Spectacle Reef, in the Straits of Mackinac, a light-house was constructed out in the open water, and in order to build that work we had to construct heavy floating machinery. That machinery is on hand now but is going to decay, and unless we make this appropriation in time so as to avail ourselves of that machinery we will have to provide for the construction of new machinery for building this light-house, which will cost over $50,000. That is the reason why I urge upon the House now, while we have this floating machinery on hand, in the interest of economy, to make this appropriation, because we must have a light-house there and appropriation must be made for it. We cannot afford to have that bold rock standing up in the track of commerce without marking its position to mariners. It must come sooner or later, and it is economy to construct the work now.

Mr. RUSK. Why not blow the rock up?

Mr. HUBBELL. I will tell the gentleman from Wisconsin that if we attempt to blow that rock up with powder it would cost over a million of dollars. It is a very large rock, abrupt on one side and shelving off on the other, making shoal water for quite a considerable distance. It is impossible ever to get rid of it, and we must put a light-house there, and this appropriation for that purpose is necessary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish for one that we had money enough to build all the light-houses that are asked for, but the committee must remember that we have to cut our garment according to our cloth. Now, Stannard Rock is in precisely the same position as forty or fifty other places where within the last few years the Treasury Department has recommended that light-houses be built. The case is exactly as stated in what has been read at the request of the gentleman from Michigan. The Treasury Department and the Light-House Board have recommended it in years past. It has been time and again before the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations have made up their bill on consultation with the Light-House Board, but have not been able to put everything in. They have asked the Light-House Board to select those sites where lights are most necessary and put those in. The Stannard Rock has never been selected by the Light-House Board as belonging to the class of sites where lights are most urgently needed.

Mr. HUBBELL. Is the gentleman aware that this is one of the points that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understand that every point that goes into the Book of Estimates is the recommendation both of the Light-House Board and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HUBBELL. This is not in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is my point and not the point of the gentleman from Michigan. This year in making up the Book of Estimates the Secretary of the Treasury, endeavoring to keep down expenditures, did not include this matter of a light-house on Stannard Rock at all. If gentlemen will look into the Book of Estimates they will find that this is the case. I have just offered two amendments providing for light-houses on these lakes at the instance of another gentleman from Michigan, and the committee have put them in. Perhaps if the amendment in this case had been smaller my good nature might have induced me to give way and I might have consented to it. But this is a claim for $200,000. If, however, after the exertions of the Committee on Appropriations to keep the bill down, the committee here put on $200,000 for a light-house at that point, that is the end of it, and I have no objection to make. I do not think, however, although the gentleman from Michigan wants it and some of his constituents want it and it may be a good thing to them—I do not think the case is so urgent as to require this appropriation to be made now.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

This matter has been urged for the last thirty years, and memorial after memorial has come to Congress from people engaged in navigating those lakes asking for a light-house at that point. In the last Congress a small appropriation of $10,000 was voted, but it was entirely insufficient for putting up any light-house whatever there that would be durable, so that it was not used and was covered back into the Treasury.

The necessity of a light on such a reef of rocks, lying in the very passage-way of all the commerce of lake Superior, which has become very large and is increasing more and more—the necessity of a light there or of some alarm signal has caused various experiments to be made of having surf-bells or wind-whistles or something of that kind placed on the rock, and temporary expedients have been resorted to. It is well known that this rock lies in the mid-channel between the head of Lake Superior and the canal at its mouth, and at any time there is a liability for vessels, of the hundreds and thousands that pass over those waters, to run on it or be driven on it by storms.

Last year it would have been attempted to have an appropriation for this light-house if it had not been that all appropriations for new works were refused; and it was for that reason that an appropriation for this was not urged by the Light-House Board, and it has been passed over this year for the same reason. Whether the whole amount stated in the amendment be voted for this year may be immaterial; but that the work should be authorized and commenced and that this rock should have some signal upon it is apparent to every one who has been on that lake. If gentlemen wish to reduce the appropriation, let them make that amendment. My friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] has never failed to put into this bill and every bill a light-house for every point on the coast of Maine where one was requested by his constituents.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have not to expend so much of my strength on the river and harbor bill as my friend from Michigan, but I desire to say that there is nothing in this bill for Maine.

Mr. CONGER. Because there is not a point which has not its light-house all along the coast of Maine.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask leave to amend my amendment by substituting $100,000 for $200,000.

There was no objection, and the amendment was modified accordingly.

The question being put on the amendment, there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BASS. I offer the following amendment, to insert after the paragraph last read, as follows:

For maintaining a light-ship off the mouth of the Detroit River, $30,000.

I desire to say in support of this amendment that probably there is no point in the world over which more commerce passes annually than over the point indicated by the proposed amendment. Those gentlemen on this floor who are at all familiar with the navigation of the lakes know that our seamen find it very difficult during the season of navigation to find with safety the entrance to the Detroit River. During the season a year ago at the mouth of this river, and by reason of bowlders in the bed of the lake off the mouth of the river, more than $170,000 worth of property was destroyed. No immediate permanent relief can be afforded until the governments of the United States and Canada shall enter upon the construction and maintenance of a light-house at or near this point. The only available point for the construction of a light-house is situated on the Canadian shore, but the importance of this light-house is so great that for many years past those gentlemen who are the owners of shipping on the lakes have been compelled, out of their own pockets, to pay for a light-ship off the mouth of the Detroit River during the last season of navigation. During the last ten years they have contributed from ten to twenty thousand dollars for the purpose of maintaining a light-ship at this point. It is not a fair tax. It is a tax that they charge against the shippers. A person transferring his commerce by vessel over the lakes is required to pay, as the consumer is, in this regard the expenses of maintaining this light-ship. I ask now as a temporary expedient that the House put this appropriation in the bill, and that the United States Government shall assume the burden of maintaining a light-ship at this point until the State Department can enter into such negotiations with Canada as will provide for the maintenance of a permanent light-house.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Has the gentleman any recommendation or estimate from the Department in reference to this matter?

Mr. BASS. I have not personally, but the Department has frequently recommended this; and in conversation with officers of the Department I have been told that the importance of a light-ship at this point cannot be overstated.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there anything before the House in the shape of estimate or request for this appropriation?

Mr. BASS. Requests for this appropriation have been sent heretofore to the Committee on Appropriations, although they have not been this year to my own personal knowledge.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is nothing on the subject in the estimates of this year.

Mr. BASS. I presume not; but these facts are within the knowledge of gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations. They are certainly within the knowledge of various members of the House and of those gentlemen whose interests are on the lakes and whose constituents reside there. It is within my own knowledge that a fund has been maintained on the lakes for years to keep up a light-ship in this vicinity. I ask, therefore, that these merchants and shippers of the West be relieved of the burden of maintaining this light-ship out of their own private means, and that this small amount be paid by the United States for the purpose of relieving the necessities of commerce.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. BASS; and on a division there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move that $20,000 be appropriated for this purpose.

I do not understand exactly why it is that on appropriation for the improvement at this one particular point, our friends over the way agree to vote it down, and are urging their friends to vote against it, when the same gentlemen have urged me to provide appropriations for the improvement of their commerce in the river and harbor bill; and unless there is some particular objection to this improvement, I regret to see this party feeling against this measure.

Now, I desire to say that by careful count of vessels that average five hundred tons burden, that pass in the seven or eight months of the season at this point, there are forty thousand passages of vessels in each season of navigation, ranging from seven to eight months. The whole navigation of the great lakes passes this point. I say that there is no place in the known world where a like amount of tonnage passes a given point. There is not one-third of that amount that passes Sandy Hook in the whole year. There is no point on the whole coast where such a number of vessels with such an amount of tonnage pass. Losses that have occurred there have amounted to from one hundred thousand to half a million dollars a year; and, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] has said, the shipping men themselves have been compelled to do what Congress has refused to do at their own expense. An appropriation of $20,000 a year would keep up a light-ship at the mouth of that river; and you need a light-ship, because the only point where a proper light-house can be built is on the Canada shore where we cannot build it; but Congress has repeatedly passed resolutions asking the Government to enter into treaty with Canada for permission to build a light-house there, and as yet they have been unsuccessful, and the Canadian government has thus far refused us permission to build it, and we tax our commerce for the purpose of maintaining a light-ship which the Government ought to keep there. It is not the commerce of any one State that is taxed; it is the commerce of the great West pouring down through them; it is the commerce of the East pouring up through them; it is the commerce of two-thirds of the States that demands this light-ship, and I hope the House will grant this trifling appropriation of $20,000 to relieve the commerce of the lakes from a burden which the Government should have assumed long, long ago. I append to my remarks a statement of the number of vessels which passed the Fort Gratiot light-house, Lake Huron, during the season of navigation in the year 1873:

JNO. P. SANBORN,
Collector of Customs.

Mr. GLOVER. I desire to make a remark or two only in answer to the allegation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] against this side of the House for their opposition to this proposition. I do not think there is any disposition on our side of the House to antagonize any proper appropriation for any section of the country; but I desire to state here that I have heard two amendments offered to this bill from the State of Michigan amounting to a quarter of a million of dollars, and I think that those amendments, if proper, should have been ingrafted on the bill on the recommendation of the Light-House Board and of the Secretary of the Treasury.

And it is possible that the gentlemen interested in these matters have had ingrafted on the bill everything that under existing circumstances should have gone in the bill; and we on this side of the House think it is not exactly fair for them to come here now and seek to amend the bill to an extent that we cannot now tell how far it will go. Propositions have been made, as I have already remarked, amounting to a quarter of a million of dollars in two successive amendments. That was the reason I have voted against the bill, and from no partisan or sectional feeling whatever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BASS. I wish to say a single word in relation to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] The gentleman last upon the floor [Mr. GLOVER] made the suggestion that gentlemen on this side of the House, or "certain gentlemen from Michigan," as he phrased it, who probably did not get all they thought they were justly entitled to at the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, had offered amendments to appropriate a quarter of a million of dollars in addition to the recommendations made by the committee.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I am not from the State of Michigan and I have not been before the Committee on Appropriations in relation to this matter to ask for a single appropriation in this bill. The constituency I have the honor to represent are largely interested in the commerce of the lakes. They are interested as carriers, though living at the very foot of the lakes, in the State of New York. But they are no more interested than are the people on the frontiers or on the sea-coast who consume the cereals of the West. Neither are they more interested than the constituents of gentlemen from the West who ship their cereals to the sea-coast by way of the lakes, and who come here session after session demanding of Congress cheaper transportation.

And yet when by a little bagatelle of an appropriation of $20,000, to be expended right within the pathway of this commerce, you can take from the shoulders of the men engaged in this carrying trade a burden of at least $20,000 annually, which they are now compelled to pay from their own pockets, and which is now made a personal charge on them in the interest of commerce, but which by all the rules and precedents of the United States should be borne by the General Government, then we ourselves are said to be influenced by sectional considerations, and to ask for appropriations at the hands of Congress to which we are not entitled.

Now I submit, not alone for myself, for I speak equally for other gentlemen who are interested in this question and who live upon the shores of the lakes, that we have no sectional pride and no sectional wish in this matter; that we ask for nothing which we would not extend to every other portion of our country.

And so far as this question is concerned let me remind the gentlemen who live on the sea-board that the commerce upon our lakes is more than fourfold greater than all the coastwise commerce upon the Atlantic sea-board. Let me remind gentlemen that the tonnage of the lakes is millions of tons greater than the tonnage which tracks the ocean along the Atlantic coast of the United States. Yet when a bagatelle of $20,000 is asked, we are told that it was not recommended by the Department.

It has already been said, and if it can make it any stronger I will repeat it, that every Department which has had charge of or anything to do with this class of appropriations has recommended the establishment of a light-house off Detroit River, the establishment of some light or system of lighting that shall guard and protect our commerce which is compelled to track those waters. But by reason of the fact that the most available location of such a light is in Canadian waters, the United States has hitherto been prevented from making the requisite appropriation. And even when last year this House passed an appropriation of $25,000 to clear out the bowlders in the mouth of the Detroit River, the officer of the United States, when he went there to perform the work, was met by Canadian officials and warned that he was trespassing upon Canadian waters, and could not expend the appropriation in the interest of commerce.

What shall we do? With millions of tons of commerce passing over these waters from year to year, leaving the expenses of protecting that commerce charged against the men engaged in shipping the produce of the West, are we to put our hands in our pockets and say that we will make no appropriation, but leave the merchants, the carriers, the shippers engaged in this class of commerce to pay all the expense from their own pockets; or will we, as we ought, make a small appropriation to at least temporarily relieve them from this burden, until proper negotiations can be concluded between the United States and Canada?

I hope this amendment will be adopted. It is one of importance and one which should pass, and I trust it may receive the approbation of gentlemen on that as well as on this side of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed. I call attention to the fact that we have but thirty minutes left of to-day's session for this bill, and we have made but little progress in it so far. I hope we now may have a vote.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Steam-tender for Pacific coast: For building a steam-tender for light-house service on the Pacific coast, $100,000.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to amend by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$50,000." I wish to learn why this appropriation for a steam-tender should be fixed at so high an amount. These vessels generally cost from forty to sixty thousand dollars. I do not think that there is one now in the light-house service that has cost anything near $100,000. The steam-tender now in use in the light-house district embracing New York City—a vessel which in the roughest sea goes outside of the bar at Sandy Hook—cost only $60,000. That is a vessel sufficient for all purposes—one that could cross the ocean with safety.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being ayes 23, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and such buoys as may be necessary, $75,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to amend by making this appropriation $100,000 instead of $75,000 and by adding after the word "necessary" these words:

Including salaries of keepers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Piedras Blancas light-station, California: For completing station and establishing fog-signal at Piedras Blancas, California, $15,000.

Mr. FIELD. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following:

And for rebuilding light-house at Windmill Point, Michigan, entrance to Lake Saint Clair, $18,000.

The light-house now standing at the point named in my amendment was constructed about forty years ago, when Chicago, Milwaukee, and all those other great cities were mere villages. At that time the tonnage navigating this great river did not exceed the present tonnage of one of our small rivers in the West. The Light-House Board have for several years past recommended that a new light-house be erected at this point. It is well known to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the whole House, that all the commerce of the Northwest passes through this channel. The light-house now standing at that point is reported by the Light-House Board to be in a dangerous condition. On account of its age and weakness it is liable to fall down at any time. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the report of the Light-House Board.

The Clerk read as follows:

Windmill Point, Michigan, entrance to Lake Saint Clair.—This station was built in 1838 and refitted in 1867. It is a very important station, as it is a guide for the whole commerce of the lakes, to Lake Saint Clair, and the Detroit River. An entirely new station is imperatively demanded here. Both tower and house are old and in poor condition and not worth repairing, and it is therefore again recommended that this station be rebuilt at a cost of $18,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ARCHER. I move to amend by inserting after the clause last read the following:

That upon vessels of all nations charging light dues upon American shipping shall be imposed charges and dues equal in amount to those levied, exacted, and charged upon American vessels by such nation or nations.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. ARCHER. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point for a few moments.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will do so to hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] will allow me to say that the seventh act ever placed on the statute-book of the United States declared that no charge for lights should ever be levied upon our coast on any vessel, foreign or domestic. This amendment proposes to change the law in that regard, and to reverse what has been our policy from the beginning of the Government.

Mr. ARCHER. The point of order being reserved by the gentleman from Maine, I wish to say that Great Britain now levies tribute upon all American tonnage going into her ports. This amendment proposes only that upon English tonnage coming into our ports exactly the same charges shall be levied. If the amendment be enacted into a law, it will yield to our Government from English tonnage alone $1,000,000 annually—one-third of all the expenses of our whole light-house system. I only ask that this Government shall do toward other nations exactly as they do toward us.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine insist on his point of order?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland would no doubt be good under the lex talionis; but it is a movement in the wrong direction. I must insist on my point of order; for instead of following the narrow policy of Great Britain, we ought to insist on her removing the restrictions of this kind which she imposes.

Mr. ARCHER. Americans are now paying the expense of keeping up British light-houses.

Mr. NEGLEY. They may as well do that as keep up British commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine insists on his point of order, and the Chair sustains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of office of surveyor-general of Arizona Territory, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $2,500.

Mr. RANDALL. As we have now reached a new division of the bill—that with regard to surveying the public lands—I suggest that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us go on till five o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment to the clause last read. I move to amend by adding the following:

For expenses of the suit to be instituted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to recover certain lands, and the rents and profits thereof, known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California, as provided in the resolution No. 142 passed by the House of Representatives on the 26th of January, 1875, $5,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that resolution is not a law of the land, and therefore does not make in order an amendment to the appropriation bill which otherwise would not be in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that it is only a resolution of the House, but this is a part of the care of the public lands for which we have the right to make appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have gone past that part of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is providing one means for taking care of the public lands. There is no law which says that the surveyor-general of Arizona shall rent an office, but that is one of the incidents of his taking care of the public lands. The House has resolved that for the care of a portion of the public lands suit shall be brought, and this provides for the prosecution of that suit.

Mr. GARFIELD. I answer that there is no law requiring any such suit; only a resolution of the House recommending that such a suit shall be brought.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Even if there were no resolution of the House still it would be in order, as it is one of the means for taking care of the public lands. I do not place it on the resolution of the House at all. There is no law for the surveyor-general of Arizona renting an office, but being an incident that he shall have an office for the care of the public lands, an appropriation for that purpose in this bill is in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I admit that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We appropriate money for it. Now, being an incident to the care of the public lands that this suit shall be prosecuted, necessarily an appropriation is in order to this bill.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question; and that is whether he does not seek to reach the enforcement in some way of the judgment of the House as declared in the resolution to which reference has been made and which the Secretary of the Interior, as he apprehends, will not execute?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Exactly; and because the Attorney-General cannot act because he has been of counsel in the case.

Mr. RANDALL. Therefore the only way the Government can secure its rightful ownership of this property as against the New Idria Company, which has been appropriating to itself the large rentals of this property without any title whatever, is to carry out the plan provided for in the resolution of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the Chair decided the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet decided it.

Mr. RANDALL. I express the hope that there may be some way in which the Government can act for its own protection in this matter.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That clearly instructs them to commence suit.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no law authorizing a suit to be begun.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to make an inquiry whether there has not been a suit already in regard to this land and whether decision has not been made against McGarrahan?

Mr. PAGE. It has been decided by the supreme court of California against McGarrahan?

Mr. RANDALL. But that does not give the title to the New Idria Company, and this suit has to be prosecuted in behalf of the Government against this company, which has no right or title to this property, but from which it has received enormous incomes.

Mr. PAGE. There has been a decision in this case by the supreme court of California.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly; but how much was paid for that decision?

Mr. RANDALL. Those who do not want the New Idria Company deprived of this property will of course vote against this appropriation, and those who wish to have justice done to the Government will vote for it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Gentlemen will see by the debate that this brings in some outside things.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course; it is a direct provision for the interest of the Government, so that justice may be done to all parties.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point that it is not germane.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I now move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. I wish to say a word on the point of order, because we have suspended the rules, and it makes no difference what is the point of order, for it entirely vanishes when the House by a two-thirds vote have suspended the rules for this very thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that were true, the Chair could rule anything out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is getting near five o'clock, and perhaps we had better rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the committee will stand by us on this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why, we have agreed to rise at five o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; but it is not five o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is very near it, and the motion to rise is always in order.

The CHAIRMAN. From such examination as the Chair has been able to give the amendment, he rules it in order.

Mr. PAGE. The resolution passed by the House some time since under a suspension of the rules, when the House had no opportunity to discuss it, provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall refuse patents for this grant until further order. It is not contended the parties upon this ground deny the right of the Government to these lands.

Now, what is the object of commencing suit? You ask the Government to commence suit against these parties who are there lawfully and legally, who have been working these mines under the mining laws of the United States. You ask the Government to commence suit against them. For what purpose? They do not have the Government title in these lands. It is for no other purpose in the world but to allow McGarrahan to come in that he may get the lands in place of the men who have been there lawfully under the mining laws of Congress. That is the whole object; and it is to use the Government as a cat's-paw to help Mr. McGarrahan to obtain title to property to which it has been decided time and again he has no valid title.

Mr. CESSNA. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAGE. Wait until I get through. I hold in my hand a decision of the supreme court of the State of California, delivered in December last, in which they decided that the title of McGarrahan to this rancho Panoche Grande was illegal and void. Now, what is the object of appropriating the money of the Government? For what purpose? No one claims the title to these lands.

Mr. RANDALL. The New Idria Company does.

Mr. PAGE. They never did.

Mr. RANDALL. They claim rentals.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

At five o'clock the committee informally rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs to be read the order adopted this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

By unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the reading of the Journal is waived, and the Committee on Appropriations shall have this day until five p. m. for the consideration of the sundry civil bill, and a recess to be taken from five to half past seven, at which last hour House bill No. 4745 shall be taken up for debate only, the previous question to be called on the same when ordered by the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will that order exclude any other business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the order plainly means that no other business can be entertained and that there shall be nothing on the bill except debate for the evening session.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 844) to authorize the promulgation of the general regulations for the government of the Army;

An act (H. R. No. 4530) further supplemental to the various acts prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections; and

An act (H. R. No. 2765) granting a pension to John W. Darby.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the order of the House, the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock. The House meets then for debate only on the bill reported by the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is chairman.

The House accordingly took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven p. m., Mr. TYNER in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, the House meets this evening for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. HURLBUT. If in order, I ask consent of the House to submit for printing and recommittal the report of the Committee on Affairs in Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be very glad, if he could, to recognize the gentleman, but under the order of the House he cannot. Debate only is in order on the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 4841) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties, and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 1156) for the relief of Joseph H. Colton;

A bill (S. No. 1185) for the relief of F. V. Hayden;

A bill (S. No. 1237) to amend section numbered 3342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to affixing stamps on brewers' casks;

A bill (S. No. 1240) to extend the time within which the board of audit for the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board; and

A bill (S. No. 1349) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. COBURN rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the committee which reports this bill, whether the bill in the report of the committee was drawn prior to the report agreed upon by the committee, or whether it was drawn subsequently?

Mr. COBURN. It was drawn prior.

Mr. BROMBERG. That is, the report was made to fit the bill, and not the bill to fit the report.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield further?

Mr. COBURN. I do not yield. These gentlemen are making their remarks altogether voluntarily.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to say to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. COBURN. From the unusual opposition to this bill it would seem that there was something in it that possibly might work great harm to the nation; that there were some principles or some propositions advanced that were contrary to precedent and totally unusual in any part of former legislation. Why this opposition has arisen I cannot conceive. Why is it that every artifice and trick of filibustering has been resorted to at this time to defeat it? But it may yet be developed in debate why it is that the democratic party are taking such unusual interest in opposing a measure which, to my mind, seems a just and wise and proper one in all respects. They have gone beyond all precedent in the history of minorities in their present course. Occasionally we have seen, too, that some members of the republican party are tardy in their support of this bill or some portion of it, and I am a little at a loss to know why they should lag.

What is there in the bill that is objectionable? What is there in the protection of a portion of the States from invasion that should be opposed—from invasion by hostile forces, from invasion by law-breakers, from invasion by the enemies of peace and order and good society? What objection can there be to that part of the bill which provides that the power and sovereignty of the States shall not be usurped; that the authorities of the officers of the State shall not be by force taken away from them; that the citizens of the State shall not enter into conspiracy for the purpose of overturning the power of the State? There can, to my mind, no objection arise why the National Government should not stand up firmly, strongly, and promptly against efforts of this kind. What objection can there be against the protection of citizens at the polls from violence and death? Why should any man say that armed men ought to be allowed to go to the polls and use those arms for the purpose of intimidating voters and driving them away from the free exercise of their rights, destroying perhaps their lives? Why any objection should be made to a bill to meet these circumstances and provide against them I cannot conceive.

Again, why should it be improper or wrong to protect the evidence of the people's will as expressed at the polls in any way? And yet one of the main provisions of this bill is that there shall be a fair registry and a fair record kept of whatever is done by the people at the elections, to be preserved in case of contest in the future, pure and true as it came from the hands of the voters themselves. What is there in this bill which provides for the protection of the people from local rebellion which is objectionable and to that part of the bill which provides for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in case of local rebellion? When it becomes overbearing, so powerful, so prevalent that the local authorities cannot stand up and take care of the interests of the people, then it is that by this bill the President of the United States is authorized to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and only then.

Now these are the questions that arise in the discussion of this bill and no others of any importance that I know of. In the first place the object of the bill is the protection of the States from invasion, invasion not alone from foreign countries, but invasion from neighboring States; and the bill provides that when two or more persons shall invade a State they shall suffer the penalties provided in the section of the bill relating thereto.

At the time of the Brooks-Baxter war in Arkansas last April and May the State was invaded from Tennessee. White-League men are said to have gone there from as far east as Chattanooga. A squad of men also come from Texas to Baxter's aid with two pieces of artillery. During the last summer it was rumored that a negro insurrection was taking place at Austin, in the State of Mississippi; whereupon a force of four hundred men under the command of the rebel General Chalmers was publicly organized at Memphis, in Tennessee. They proceeded by steamboat to Austin, with ammunition and arms, landed, formed in military order and in line of battle before that town under the impression that the negroes were there in force. Chalmers, acting upon the belief that he had not men enough, sent back to Memphis and Arkansas for re-enforcements, whereupon about four hundred more men were raised in Memphis, and some additional men at Helena, in Arkansas. But in the mean time it was ascertained that there were no negroes in force at Austin, and the invaders departed and dispersed.

At the time of the terrible massacre at Coushatta, in Louisiana, that State was invaded by armed men from the State of Arkansas, who marched upon the route leading to the place of the massacre; but failing to make connection before the catastrophe returned to their homes. The White-League papers of Louisiana at the time stated that a regiment of armed men crossed the border from Texas to assist in the massacre; and it was alleged by some that these men and not the citizens of Louisiana committed the murders. When the slaughter of colored republicans took place recently at Vicksburgh large numbers of armed men came from Louisiana to aid in the work.

E. D. Richardson, a witness before the Mississippi Committee, testified as follows:

Question. Do you know of any white persons coming into the city from the outside of the county of Warren on these days, Monday and Tuesday?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. About how many?
A. I cannot say; probably fifty, maybe seventy-five, came here from across the river.
Q. From what place?
A. From Monroe, in Louisiana.
Q. Were they armed when they came?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What time did they reach here and how did they come?
A. I think about two o'clock Monday night or Tuesday morning.
Q. What did they come on?
A. I am satisfied they came on the North Louisiana and Texas Railroad.
Q. Where does that terminate?
A. At Delta, Louisiana, opposite here.
Q. At whose instance did they come?
A. I understand they came here to help protect the city from the violence of the colored people.
Q. Did you hear from anybody at whose request they came?
A. I heard that there were bodies of men at different points ready to come here to assist the city of Vicksburgh against the violence of the colored population.
Q. Was it a militia company?
A. It seemed to be a promiscuous gathering.
Q. How were they armed?
A. They had different kinds of arms; some had Winchester rifles, some shotguns, and guns of various patterns.
Q. When they came where did they report? Where were they placed on active duty?
A. Here about the court-house, as a sort of guard.
Q. How long did they remain here?
A. My impression is they went away Wednesday morning.
Q. Do you not know that there were very many men who offered their services even as far north as Cairo, Illinois, and from different northern cities and places along the river?
A. I know from hearsay that there was a large number ready to come at a moment's warning from Cairo, Memphis, Louisiana, and different points—Port Gibson and other points along the river; all of whom were ready to come if their services were needed to defend the city.
Q. Did not the Knights Templars on their way North from New Orleans offer to come over and assist in the defense?
A. Well, sir, I heard it said they would.

GEORGE W. WALTON sworn:

Question. Are you president of the board of supervisors?
Answer. Yes.
Q. Look at that dispatch and tell me when you received it?

[Copy of dispatch.]

TRINITY, TEXAS, December 12, 1874.

To the President of the Board of Supervisors:

Do you want any men? Can raise good crowd within twenty-four hours to kill out your negroes.

J. G. GATES.
A. H. MASON.

Q. Did you receive that dispatch from the telegraph office?
A. Yes, sir; I received it from the carrier.
Q. At what time?
A. It was received Sunday morning about eight or nine o'clock.

During the month of August, 1874, a disturbance was created at Ridge Spring, in Edgefield County, South Carolina, arising out of a quarrel between a white man and a negro about a small business transaction. The white man started the report that the negroes were going to murder the whites, and the latter, several hundred in number, assembled well armed and threatened the negroes, creating intense excitement. They sent word to Augusta, in Georgia, and a company of twenty-five or thirty men went at once, well armed, to Ridge Spring. They called themselves "Georgia Tigers," and declared they went there to help their brethren in South Carolina. They were received with cheers for Georgia. The trains carrying the mails were stopped, persons were taken off and held as prisoners. At this time there was not an armed negro in many miles of the place, all of them having left upon hearing a rumor of the disturbance, and no opportunity was afforded for the perpetration of murders. The Augusta papers published these facts and boasted of the conduct of the Tigers, who went to the aid of their white friends in South Carolina, and also said that there were hundreds more ready to start from Augusta on the same errand if necessary. Arms were shipped publicly to Ridge Spring from Augusta.

In Western Alabama a rumor was circulated that there was to be a negro insurrection at Belmont, in Marengo County, Alabama, during last summer. The sheriff collected a posse to suppress it; he took men from an adjoining county and from the State of Mississippi as part of his posse. The testimony shows that two car-loads came over from Meridian, in Mississippi, a telegram having been sent for them. They were all armed and turned out promptly. On arriving at Belmont the rumor of the negro uprising proved to be false and they returned to Mississippi. I quote from the testimony of William D. Battle, a democrat, and marshal of Livingston, Alabama:

Question. Where did the posse from Gainesville meet you?
Answer. I do not know.
Q. You knew there was a posse from Gainesville?
A. No, sir; it was a posse from Demopolis or Belmont.
Q. Demopolis is in another county?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How did the sheriff summon a posse from another county?
A. I do not know.
Q. Where did the Mississippi party meet you from Meridian?
A. At McDowell's, at Belmont.
Q. How did the sheriff summon a portion of his posse from another State?
A. I do not know.

Q. He incorporated the Mississippi party and the Demopolis party? Demopolis is in Greene County?
A. No, sir; it is in Marengo County, on the bank of the river.
Q. He incorporated those parties in the posse of Sumter County?
A. I do not know whether he did or not.
Q. Did they not go with him?
A. Yes, sir; he took charge of them.
Q. About how many were from Demopolis?
A. I have no idea.
Q. Nor any idea how many were from Meridian, Mississippi?
A. No, sir.
Q. You have no idea how many were from either place?
A. No, sir.
Q. How large was the posse when it was consolidated?
A. I suppose that there was between one hundred and sixty and two hundred men.
Q. All armed?
A. I suppose not; some of them were armed—most of them were.
Q. How long did that posse remain together?
A. Two days. I do not mean to say that the whole crowd staid there; more or less they were there—off and on; some of them.

I also quote from the testimony of Captain William Mills, who was in command at Livingston:

Question. On the day that they arranged the barbecue and the tournament in town, were many of the people armed?
Answer. I saw a good many about that day with guns; I believe a great many had revolvers, but I did not see them. That was particularly the case, I think, in the evening, because about five o'clock I heard that the sheriff was around getting up a posse to go to Belmont, and I saw a great many with guns. I however saw a good many in the morning with shot-guns. It was a common thing to see shot-guns there. When I first went there I observed that. I understood that seventy-five men came from Meridian, and I had a conversation in Demopolis with a gentleman who was with a party who came up from there to go to Belmont, and he told me that there were two car loads of them, which came from Meridian. That would make about eighty people. I saw it stated in the papers afterward that there were seventy-five from Meridian.

In view of such facts it is deemed advisable to enact a law preventing them under severe penalties. The policy and propriety of this can hardly be questioned, and it is believed that it will not be seriously contended that such an enactment could work any wrong.

Not only are States subject to violent and armed invasions, but likewise to the no less hostile and dangerous inroads of fraudulent voters, who cross the border to destroy the political rights of their neighbors. I will give some instances.

At the recent election Georgians invaded the State of Alabama at Brownsville, which is opposite Columbus, and at other points. The testimony of Lyman E. Brooks, a farmer, and a native of Columbus, and a resident for fifteen years of Browsnville, shows this:

Question. How close is that place to the State of Georgia?
Answer. The high-water mark of the Chattahoochee River is the Georgia line, and I think this box is located about three or four hundred yards from the line.
Q. Is it in the town of Brownsville?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State whether there were any illegal votes cast at that election.
A. There were.
Q. Give your reasons for saying that, and state how many there were, you being the supervisor, and your business being to watch the box.
A. My reasons for making the statement that there was illegal voting are that I saw several repeat.
Q. Had you no means of stopping that?
A. No, sir.
Q. Is that the only reason for saying there were illegal votes cast? Did you see any person from Georgia vote?
A. I saw one man from Georgia vote there that I know.
Q. Were there other persons from Georgia there?
A. I saw other persons there that I have every reason to believe lived in Georgia.
Q. Did they vote?
A. They did.
Q. How many illegal votes did you estimate, from your position as supervisor, were cast there that day?
A. I did not keep any account.
Q. In your own mind you must have formed some estimate from the former number of votes and from what you know of that community, having lived there for fifteen years.
The WITNESS. Do you mean repeated votes, including illegal votes?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes; all kinds.
A. I should think there were as much as two hundred. There was all of that.
Q. State whether many colored men voted at that poll.
A. Yes, sir; there were some voted there.
Q. How many do you suppose?
A. I should judge there were some seventy-five.
Q. State whether the bulk of the colored men of that county voted here or there?
A. They did not vote there.
Q. Do you know where they did vote?
A. No, sir.
Q. What is the reason they did not vote there, if you know?
A. The only reason that I heard was that they thought they could not get a fair vote there; that they would not be allowed to vote the ticket they wanted to vote.
Q. Why could they not vote there?
A. On account of intimidation, and they thought they would be prevented by the democratic party.
Q. Where do the colored voters in this county usually vote?
A. I think the bulk of them vote in this place.
Q. Do you think that is the reason they vote here?
A. That is the reason they say. That is generally given out as the reason.
Q. How many miles is it to where you live?
A. About twenty-five miles.

Dallas B. Smith, a merchant of Opelika, also testifies to railroad trains bringing in Georgians to vote.

Question. Do you know of the railroad being used on the day of the election to run voters without charge?
Answer. I do from report.
Q. Where were the voters run from or to?
A. From Columbus and West Point, and other points in Georgia.
Q. What kind of voters?
A. I understood to vote the democratic ticket.
Q. Where were they run to?
A. To Salem, this point, Loachapoka, and other points.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:
Q. How do you know it?
A. I know it from hearsay, from reliable parties.
By Mr. BUCKNER:
Q. They may have heard it by report, too?
A. No, sir; the party who reported it to me was on board the train himself.
Q. Who is he?
A. His name is John R. McGovern, and he is clerking for me at this time.
Q. Is he the only person from whom you have this information?
A. No, sir; I had information from Squire Crawford, of Salem. There was a car-load of voters brought up from Brownsville and the car switched off at Salem, and the train came up here and went back, and the car was carried back to Brownsville.
Q. Did they take the same voters back?
A. He said so. The car was full.
Q. Were they white or black voters?
A. They were white.
Q. What ticket did they vote?
A. The democratic ticket. There was no republican vote polled there.
Q. Is that in this county?
A. Yes, sir.

Charles Smith, of Union Springs, testifies to the inroads of Georgians to vote. He is a member of the Legislature, and said:

Two weeks ago while my colleague and myself were going to Columbus, Mr. Price, on the Mobile and Girard Railroad, said that he was glad that the elections were over, and said, "You republicans were not fairly defeated. I know myself that, on the train on which I was conductor, on the day of the election, a great number of white men went from Georgia into your State and voted at three or four different places three or four different times on that day."

Addison G. Smith, a resident and native of Livingston, in Western Alabama, testifies to the fact that he was in a sheriff's posse, which was armed and mounted to arrest negroes, and that some ten or twelve men came over from Mississippi and joined the posse, a dispatch being sent them that the negroes were rising to murder them.

Hon. CHARLES PELHAM, a member of Congress from Alabama, testifies to inroad of Georgians to vote in large numbers.

Question. Where were you on election day?
Answer. I was at a place called Girard, in Russell County. I live in Talladega County; but in Russell County we had lost the election four years ago by the destruction of all the ballots. All the ballots were destroyed in that county. There were only one or two active white republicans in that county, and a very large republican majority and our friends thought it best for me to go there on that day of the election. It is just opposite Columbus, Georgia.
Q. Is it on the railroad?
A. Yes, sir; there is a road running from Girard by Seal's Station.
Q. State what came under your own notice during election day at Girard, and what subsequently happened as connected with that election?
A. I went over into Girard about eight o'clock on the day of the election; but to understand it, I will say that I went over to Columbus—it is separated from Girard by a bridge—a day or two before the election, with the Sixth Auditor here, Mr. Martin. I went over from Tuskegee on Sunday. I ascertained over there that they were raising money in Columbus to send a gang of repeaters over to Montgomery, Alabama, on the day of the election, and vote them at the various depots from Montgomery back to the Georgia line. I got that information very accurately, and knew they were raising the money for it; and I ascertained in the evening that the squad would leave that night. I hired a man to go along with them from Columbus to Montgomery and come back with them. I wrote a letter to the chairman of the executive committee of the republican party, and to the district attorney and district marshal, to send along with this squad of repeaters, who were organized in Georgia, with a view to try to prevent them from repeating. Mr. Martin, the Sixth Auditor, went over to the depot with my messenger, and he became so much alarmed that he would not go. He was to go to Tuskegee and come back and stay until the next day, saying that he would not go with such a crowd. They went out on a freight-train at nine o'clock. Martin was frightened. They were foreigners, and drinking a good deal. They, however, went to Montgomery that night, with that man whom I sent with them.
Q. What tickets did those repeaters vote?
A. They voted the democratic ticket, so far as I could see, every time.
Q. What do you know of parties coming from Columbus, Georgia, to vote, if anything?
A. They came in great squads, came in express wagons in great droves. I noticed one man voting. I thought I had seen him before. I looked at him and asked him if he was not from Clay County. He told me yes. I asked him what he was voting here in Girard for. He said he was over in Columbus with a drove of beeves; they were all voting, "so I can vote, and I am going to do it." His name is Scarborough, a Baptist minister in good standing in Clay County, Alabama, and in charge of two churches there. He voted the democratic ticket, and the men with him driving beeves, from the same county, did so. He said that he was over in Columbus selling the beef. I saw men with their hands full of new half dollars, fractional currency, offering it publicly, in violation of the statutes, to negroes to vote.
Q. Were they white men?
A. Yes, sir; and prominent democratic politicians. I saw them offering that to voters; saw men take it, and saw them vote.

That portion of the bill intending to make the invasion of States a crime, it is believed, finds ample warrant in that clause of the Constitution which provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion. The Federalist upon this subject says:

A protection against invasion is due from every society to the parts composing it. The latitude of the expression here used seems to secure each State not only against foreign hostility, but against ambitious or vindictive enterprises of its more powerful neighbors. The history of both ancient and modern confederacies proves that the weaker members of the Union ought not to be insensible to the policy of this article.

One State may overrun another, may send in hordes of its lawless citizens and usurp the rights of its weaker neighbor, may dictate its policy, may control its legislative and executive power by this means, and no redress be directly afforded. The General Government should stand as ready to defend against such inroads as against the irruptions of a foreign power. They may be equally as destructive and dangerous, and fasten upon a free people contrary to their will institutions as odious and galling as those dictated by foreign armies.

The construction that the operation of this guarantee is confined to foreign invasion would rob it of half its beneficial power. It may be well to add that the bill contemplates only invasions with violence.

Now these occurences take place occasionally in different parts of the South, and as they occur one after another, being in distant places, not much notice is taken of them, and the worst part of it is the local authorities take no notice of them whatever. Whose business, then, is it to take cognizance of these crimes? Who has authority and strength to protect the States, and who can protect the citizens when the States cannot from invasion and outrages of this kind?

If it is possible that the citizens of one State may go across its borders and deprive their neighbors of their political rights, if they can make majorities, if they can intimidate voters, if they can cross the borders of their States for the purpose of aiding outlaws in their outrages upon peaceable citizens, and the State authorities will take no notice of it, what have we to do? If the General Government cannot step in, what have we but an organized anarchy, protecting criminals of the deepest dye in our midst? I can imagine nothing more shameful and disgraceful to a great, free, and powerful republic than to allow in its borders outrages of this kind.

The second branch of this bill relates to usurpations and conspiracies to overthrow the authority of the State. Has there been anything of that kind? Has anything happened within the last year or two that would justify the action of Congress in relation to that matter? When we look at the State of Arkansas we see a memorable instance of this kind, one that is acknowledged, one in which a party of men have usurped and overthrown, without authority of law and contrary to the established constitution, the permanent institutions of the State.

In that State in the month of May last a series of events began which have resulted in the complete revolution of the State government. The contest for governor was at that time decided in court and Brooks declared to be the legal incumbent of the office. Baxter, the previous governor, in defiance of the judgment thus rendered, and making no appeal, assembled a military force to eject the new governor, and Brooks surrounded himself by troops also. Bloodshed followed, but the results were not so serious in that direction as were feared. Baxter was reinstated by the proclamation of the President, took possession of his office, and then followed a series of acts of fraud, terror, violence, usurpation, tyranny, and anarchy which have overwhelmed every branch of the State and county governments and scattered all existing laws with the fury of a tornado. In order to eradicate completely the power of the republican party a State convention was called to amend the constitution contrary to the legal provisions for that purpose.

The Legislature which passed the law for submitting the question for a constitutional convention met under the following circumstances, as detailed by the majority of the Committee on the Condition of Affairs in Arkansas:

On the 11th of May, 1874, when the Legislature assembled at this called session, the city of Little Rock, the capital of the State, was divided into two military camps. Baxter and Brooks had then each a considerable force of armed men in the field to support their respective pretensions to gubernatorial authority, and each had himself surrounded with regular military lines.

The State-house was in possession of Brooks, and was surrounded by his forces; and in the immediate vicinity were the headquarters of Baxter, surrounded by his troops. Martial law had also been declared by Baxter in the county of Pulaski, in which the capital is situated. When the Legislature assembled on the 11th of May, as Brooks was in possession of the State-house, they met in a hall within the military lines of Baxter, and at that time, and up to the 15th of May, when the President's proclamation recognizing Baxter was promulgated, no persons were admitted within the lines except on passes given by Baxter's military authorities.

On the 16th, the day the act was passed for a constitutional convention, there were present in the house fifty members—twenty-four old members and twenty-six elected at a special election, and it did not appear there had been any more present up to that time.

In the senate on the 16th there were fifteen senators present and voting—nine old members and six chosen at special election—and no greater number had been present before that time. The new members in both houses were admitted on the certificate of the secretary of state to a list furnished by him to each house, which appeared to be the prima facie evidence to a right to a seat by the law of the State. The new members were admitted to seats and sworn without question, and no other persons appeared to claim the seats occupied by them.

The following facts appeared in relation to the certificates upon which these new members took their seats; Johnson, the secretary of state was not in the State. His office was in the State-house, which was occupied by Brooks and surrounded by his military force. The returns of the election of members at the special election were in the office. A. H. Garland was deputy secretary of state, and if the returns were accessible to him he did not call for them, but made up the certified list of new members from information and newspaper reports, and not from the returns in the office. There was no evidence that any one on the list was not duly elected, except the objections before stated.

Under the constitution of 1868 it was the duty of the Legislature to provide by law for the registration of voters, and the laws referred to were passed in pursuance of this authority some years previously to this time. But for this election a new rule was adopted. The committee say:

The Legislature provided in this act for the appointment by the Legislature itself of a State board of supervisors, to consist of three persons; this State board to appoint a county board of three in each county; the county board to appoint election judges in each precinct, and the judges to appoint election clerks.

It also provides that "as the electors present themselves at the polls to vote, the judges of election shall pass upon their qualifications, whereupon the clerks of election shall register their names on the poll-books, if qualified, and such registration by said clerks shall be sufficient registration in conformity to the constitution of this State, and then their votes shall be taken.

It is not questioned but that the Legislature may change the provisions regulating registration as well as other laws, but it is insisted that this is really a provision that there shall be no registration for this election; that it only provides for keeping a check or tally list of voters; a wholly different thing from registration.

It is plainly an evasion of the requirement of registration at this particular election.

The constitution of 1868 provided that "in all elections by the people the electors shall vote by ballot. The secrecy of the ballot shall be preserved inviolate, and the General Assembly shall provide suitable laws for that purpose."

The act calling this convention provided as follows: "The electors shall be numbered and the number of each elector marked on his ballot by one of the judges when deposited."

By this provision a certain means of evidence was provided and perpetuated, by which it could be shown how, or for whom, every elector voted. The committee think it very clear that this was not preserving the secrecy of the ballot inviolate, and that this provision was a clear violation of this constitutional provision, and if this question was raised before a judicial tribunal to determine the validity of the act in a suit between private parties, it would necessarily have to be decided unconstitutional.

The election under this law was held on the 30th day of June, 1874. The vote, as returned to and declared by the State board of supervisors was, for convention, 80,259; against convention, 8,607; majority for convention, 71,652. At the same election delegates to the convention were chosen. The convention met on the 14th of July, and proceeded to form a new constitution, a copy of which will be found in the evidence submitted.

The act calling the convention did not in terms direct that it should be submitted to the people for ratification. The convention was called "for the purpose of framing a new constitution, and for providing for putting the same in force." The convention, however, made provision for the submission of the constitution for ratification.

Attached to the constitution was a schedule, containing some provisions evidently designed as a part of the permanent fundamental law, but mainly made up of provisions and details in regard to the vote upon the question of ratifying the constitution.

They provided for substantially the same machinery to conduct the election as the Legislature had provided for the election calling the convention: State and county boards of registration, with the same provisions for registration, and the same provision as to numbering the voters and their ballots. To these provisions, of course, any objection would lie that would be available against the act of the Legislature.

But the objection against this action of the convention goes much deeper than to the action of the Legislature. The Legislature were clothed with legislative power and had the right to pass laws within the constitutional limit. But this convention had no legislative power whatever. Although there has been great diversity of opinion and practice by such conventions formerly, we think it must now be regarded as settled that no legislative power is inherent in such conventions, and none can be delegated to them by the Legislature. (Jameson on Constitutional Conventions, 387; Wells et al. vs. Election Commissioners, Penn. case.)

The convention might doubtless have fixed a time for the election, and made any other mere regulations in regard to it, but if they submitted it to the people for ratification they should have done it under the existing law, and to be conducted by the existing officers of the law.

There was an existing registration, there were existing officers of registration and election, and the convention had no power to displace them and provide others.

The way being thus paved for the State convention, the next step was to annihilate the courts and thus remove the only power that could suspend or set aside their schemes of usurpation. To do this effectually articles of impeachment were preferred against the judges of the supreme court and other State officers. Some to escape impeachment resigned; those who did not resign were by a law hastily passed suspended from doing any official duties while impeachment proceedings were pending. All of their places were filled ad interim by appointment by Governor Baxter. The judges thus appointed had their hands tied at once by another act of the Legislature, as follows:

SECTION 1. That all judges of this State are prohibited from issuing any writ or process whatever, or taking any action, or assuming any jurisdiction in or about or in connection with the election provided for in the act to which this is supplementary and amendatory, except in so far as may be necessary for the preservation of peace and order and to secure the holding such election: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not be construed so as to amend or in anywise impair the criminal jurisdiction of criminal and circuit courts as specified in the act to which this is supplementary and amendatory.

Here, then, we see the State executive officers removed, the judiciary paralyzed, and the Legislature packed with fraudulent members, all for the purpose of changing the State constitution in a manner utterly at war with law, precedents, and the first principles of free government, the ultimate object of all these outrages being the overthrow of the republican party. To surround a legislative hall by military force and require passes from the soldiers for the members before admission to their seats, as such, is an abomination to every lover of liberty; to make up the roll of the Legislature by a corrupt bargain, is revolting; to recognize such men as members of a legislative body is abhorrent to every fair-minded man; to approve of their acts in subverting the constitution they had sworn to support, is the very essence of despotism. And when this is coupled with the impeachment and arrest of one set of judges, and the legislative suspension of the powers of their successors, it would seem that oppression could go no further until all these acts are made but the initial step to the erection of a new constitution in sublime mockery of all human rights. Such is the present constitution of Arkansas. Begun, carried through, completed in fraud, in violence, in usurpation, stained by ten thousand crimes, covered with the gloom of robbery, imprisonment, exile, and murder.

To illustrate the method of getting possession of offices, I will quote some of the testimony of James F. Vaughn, of Pine Bluff, sheriff of Jefferson County. He said that martial law was declared on the 25th April, 1874, and he was forcibly ejected from his office:

Question. Who issued the declaration of martial law?

Answer. H. King White.

Q. Go on and state what interference was made with you in your office?

A. My office was forcibly taken possession of by General White and the soldiers who were with him. They took possession of the public buildings and of the tax-books and records of the county. He had two companies there.

Q. Your office was in one of the public buildings?

A. By virtue of my office I am custodian of the public buildings. They were all taken possession of, including the jail and prisoners.
Q. What did you say in reference to the tax-books and records, &c.?
A. I said they were taken possession of.
Q. How much revenue was there on hand when they took possession of it?
A. I am not able to say.
Q. What was done with you?
A. That evening about eleven o'clock I was in town, and I met General White. He had been out looking for me. I met him on the sidewalk, and a conversation took place. He made some inquiry in regard to the revenue and the books. I told him that the books and the revenue were in the office when they took possession of it. There was nothing further done until the 23d of May. On that day I was arrested.

* * * * * * *

General White came rushing out to the back of the store, and said, "Mr. Williams, have you executed the warrant on Mr. Vaughn yet?" Williams answered no; that the warrant was in the hands of the deputy yet, but that I had acknowledged service of the warrant. White then asked him what he was going to do with me. Williams answered, "Mr. Vaughn is my prisoner, and I am responsible for his appearance on Monday morning." General White said, "By God, if that is the way you execute warrants for treason, I will get somebody who will execute them." Williams said, "General White, if you want my commission, by God, you can have it. Mr. Vaughn is my prisoner, and I am responsible for him." I told Mr. Williams there was no necessity for him to get in any trouble with General White on my account; that I was willing to go to jail, especially to avoid his getting into trouble.
Q. By whom did he say he was so ordered?
A. He said that General White ordered him to take us to jail. We said, "All right," and they took us down to jail and put us there.
Q. How long were you kept in jail?
A. They kept us in the county jail three days. They kept us in confinement fourteen days.
Q. The jail had been in your custody previous to your capture?
A. Yes.
Q. Who had the custody of the jail while you were a prisoner?
A. Colonel Franklin, who was quartermaster of Baxter's army in Jefferson County.
Q. Who was King White?
A. He claimed, I believe, to be major-general in Baxter's forces.
Q. Did you have any trial during any of this time?
A. I had a trial the last day I was in jail.
Q. Did you make any attempt to have any trial before?
A. We did.
Q. Before the magistrate?
A. Yes; we made an attempt the evening of our arrest.
Q. What became of your effort to get a trial?
A. We could not get one.
Q. Who was your attorney?
A. John A. Williams.
Q. What did they do with him?
A. About three days afterward they arrested him and put him in jail with us.
Q. How long did they keep him in custody?
A. About nine or ten days.
Q. This warrant charged you with treason, did it?
A. Yes.
Q. Have you a copy of the warrant?
A. I have not.
Q. Did you read it?
A. I did.
Q. What was the treason charged against you?
A. It just used the word treason. The warrant was written by General White in his own handwriting, and was signed by Eugene Nordmann.
Q. During the time you were held in custody, were any propositions made to you in reference to your resigning as sheriff?
A. There were.
Q. Who made them?
A. Dr. James M. Holcomb, and directly by Joseph W. Bocage.
Q. What was the substance of their talk?
A. On the evening of the 20th, the Sunday evening after my arrest, Doctor Holcomb arrived in Pine Bluff from Little Rock. He had been here figuring some time. He was a very prominent Baxter man. His proposition was that if myself and Mr. Kenyon, who was county treasurer, and Mr. J. L. Murphy, one of the board of supervisors of Jefferson County, being the only three officials in confinement, would resign our offices, and give our resignation to him, Doctor Holcomb, to use, as he stated, to his own advantage, for some other purpose which he would explain to us, and if we would sign a proposition to that effect, and would sign an agreement that we would support the parties whom he would name as delegates to the constitutional convention, (he did not name any of them except himself,) and would agree to work in favor of the constitutional convention, he would have all of us out of jail in two hours.
Q. What response did you make to that proposition?
A. As Judge McClure said yesterday, we coquetted with him for an hour or two and desired to consult with our attorney, Mr. Williams. We made an appointment with him to meet us at half past eleven o'clock and in the mean time we would send for Mr. Williams, as we did. He came down. Of course we had made up our minds what to do. We did not propose to accept any proposition of the kind. Mr. Williams came, and he advised the same thing. At half past eleven Doctor Holcomb came and we told him that Mr. Williams had been there and had waited for him for some time and that he had better go out and look for him. We put him off in that way until morning. Next morning he took me to the east room of the jail and talked to me for a little while there in reference to the matter. I told him that, so far as I myself was concerned, (the others might do as they had a mind to,) I was elected by 2,200 majority of the citizens of Jefferson County; and that before I would compromise those citizens I would remain and rot in that jail; and I would not accept this proposition.
Q. What was your majority when you were elected sheriff?
A. Something over 2,200.
Q. Is John A. Williams a member of the constitutional convention?
A. He is.
Q. What was his majority?
A. Twenty-one hundred and sixty-five.
Q. He was elected since his arrest?
A. Yes.
Q. What was Williams arrested for?
A. I know no reason in the world, any further than that he was our attorney.
Q. State whether the town of Pine Bluff was held by the soldiers and property taken; give us a description of the condition of things there.
A. The town was held from the night of the 25th of April up to about the 5th or 6th of June.
Q. Were property and supplies taken?
A. Yes; property and supplies, and stock, and arms, and ammunition were taken promiscuously from the citizens by the military.
Q. Your county is largely against Baxter, as shown in the last election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were there Baxter candidates running for the constitutional convention?
A. There were.
Q. How many votes did they get?
A. One thousand and eight votes out of 3,400 or 3,500. We had a little over 3 to 1.

This is a specimen of the manner in which county officers were disposed of. The following testimony of Edgar A. Nichols, late sheriff of Hot Springs County, is a further illustration of this method of dealing with civil officers; ropes and artillery were the mild antidotes applied to his case, with a little seasonable banishment:

Question. State your residence and occupation.
Answer. I reside in Hot Springs County; I was sheriff of that county before the Brooks war. I was elected in 1872. I am not acting as sheriff now.
Q. Go on and state how your office was taken.
A. During the troubles I was captured at Benton. I was taken off the train and was confined in the hotel at Benton about three days. While I was absent from home, Colonel Bull and a party of ten men came to my house looking for me. They had ropes, and he said that they had orders to hang me. He had some artillery on the train, and he notified my wife to move the women and children out of my house, as he was going to open on the house with grape and canister. My house is situated near the railroad track. It is a large hotel at Malvern. The whole party went through the house and searched it, and took what they wanted out of the bar. They waited there until the accommodation train arrived, thinking I might come upon it. But I was in confinement at Benton, and was not released until two days after that, when I came home. My life had been threatened by parties in the county as well as by this command of Bull's, and when I came home my wife begged me to go to Saint Louis, or go somewhere out of the State until the troubles were over. I went to Saint Louis, and staid there for two weeks, when I saw in the papers that everybody had been pardoned; then I started to come home. When I got to Malvern, the place where I lived, there were two detectives of Baxter's there, waiting to arrest me for treason, so my clerk informed me. I locked myself up in the sleeping-car and went through to Texas. Then I saw in the papers a few days after that that I had been impeached, and I came back to Little Rock as soon as I saw it. My successor was confirmed by the senate. I went and talked to Governor Baxter. I told him that I intended to leave the State, and asked him if he would allow me to settle up my business. He said that he would, if I would resign; and I then resigned. Since that time I have staid at home, and have kept five or six shot-guns in the house ready for any emergency.

The sheriff of Conway County, on examination, says that he is satisfied if he returns there the people will kill him. The community is infested with a set of cut-throats and murderers and with men for whom rewards have been offered, who are outlaws now, but who are running at large through the country under the protection of a militia company which is supported by the State government. Prominent democrats advised him not to return lest he be killed.

The auditor of state, the treasurer, and other officers shared a like fate. Two of the judges of the supreme court were arrested by the military officers of Baxter while going to the seat of government to hold court and held as prisoners for days; another escaped by sudden flight. The court was broken up, the judges impeached in their absence, and all this done as a part of the plan to destroy the State government for political purposes.

In the face of such infernal outlawry who would hesitate to give the President the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus? What is it worth when judges are thus impeached, captured, driven off by terror, held by force of arms, their courts closed, their voices silent, their orders a nullity, their offices a plaything for usurpers?

In Louisiana affairs are in as bad a condition. Anarchy has reigned there in many districts for months. Justice is denied in the courts. The murder of colored men is treated as nothing; the warring factions have used every expedient of fraud and force to obtain and hold political power. I quote from the President's message and Judge Woods's charge to show the actual facts in a more succinct form than I can give them. Judge Woods says in a recent case:

"In the case on trial there are many facts not in controversy. I proceed to state some of them in the presence and hearing of counsel on both sides; and if I state as a conceded fact any matter that is disputed they can correct me."

After stating the origin of the difficulty, which grew out of an attempt of white persons to drive the parish judge and sheriff, appointees of Kellogg, from office, and their attempted protection by colored persons, which led to some fighting, in which quite a number of negroes were killed, the judge states:

"Most of those who were not killed were taken prisoners. Fifteen or sixteen of the blacks had lifted the boards and taken refuge under the floor of the court-house. They were all captured. About thirty-seven men were taken prisoners. The number is not definitely fixed. They were kept under guard until dark. They were led out, two by two, and shot. Most of the men were shot to death. A few were wounded, not mortally, and by pretending to be dead were afterward, during the night, able to make their escape. Among them was the Levi Nelson named in the indictment.

"The dead bodies of the negroes killed in this affair were left unburied until Tuesday, April 15, when they were buried by a deputy marshal and an officer of the militia from New Orleans. These persons found fifty-nine dead bodies. They showed pistol-shot wounds, the great majority in the head, and most of them in the back of the head. In addition to the fifty-nine dead bodies found, some charred remains of dead bodies were discovered near the court-house. Six dead bodies were found under a warehouse all shot in the head, but one or two which were shot in the breast.

"The only white men injured from the beginning of these troubles to their close were Hadnot and Harris. The court-house and its contents were entirely consumed.

"There is no evidence that any one in the crowd of whites bore any lawful warrant for the arrest of any of the blacks. There is no evidence that either Nash or Cazabat, after the affair, ever demanded their offices, to which they had set up claim, but Register continued to act as parish judge and Shaw as sheriff.

"These are facts in this case as I understand them to be admitted."

The President says:

To hold the people of Louisiana generally responsible for these atrocities would not be just; but it is a lamentable fact that insuperable obstructions were thrown in the way of punishing these murderers, and the so-called conservative papers of the State not only justified the massacre, but denounced as Federal tyranny and despotism the attempt of the United States officers to bring them to justice. Fierce denunciations ring through the country about office-holding and election matters in Louisiana, while every one of the Colfax miscreants goes unwhipped of justice, and no way can be found in this boasted land of civilization and Christianity to punish the perpetrators of this bloody and monstrous crime.

Not unlike this was the massacre in August last. Several northern young men of capital and enterprise had started the little and flourishing town of Coushatta. Some of them were republicans and office-holders under Kellogg. They were therefore doomed to death. Six of them were seized and carried away from their homes and murdered in cold blood. No one has been punished; and the conservative press of the State denounced all efforts to that end, and boldly justified the crime.

Many murders of a like character have been committed in individual cases which cannot here be detailed. For example, T. S. Crawford, judge, and P. H. Harris, district attorney of the twelfth judicial district of the State, on their way to court, were shot from their horses by men in ambush, on the 8th of October, 1873, and the widow of the former, in a communication to the Department of Justice, tells a piteous tale of the persecutions of her husband because he was a Union man, and of the efforts made to screen those who had committed a crime, which, to use her own language, "left two widows and nine orphans desolate."

To summarize: In September last an armed, organized body of men, in the support of candidates who had been put in nomination for the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, at the November election, in 1872, and who had been declared not elected by the board of canvassers, recognized by all the courts to which the question had been submitted, undertook to subvert and overthrow the State government that had been recognized by me, in accordance with previous precedents. The recognized governor was driven from the State-house, and, but for his finding shelter in the United States custom-house, in the capital of the State of which he was governor, it is scarcely to be doubted that he would have been killed.

From the State-house, before he had been driven to the custom-house, a call was made in accordance with the fourth section, fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, for the aid of the General Government to suppress domestic violence. Under those circumstances, and in accordance with my sworn duties, my proclamation of the 15th of September, 1874, was issued. This served to reinstate Governor Kellogg to his position nominally; but it cannot be claimed that the insurgents have, to this day, surrendered to the State authorities the arms belonging to the State, or that they have in any sense disarmed. On the contrary, it is known that the same armed organizations that existed on the 14th of September, 1874, in opposition to the recognized State government, still retain their organization, equipments, and commanders, and can be called out at any hour to resist the State government. Under these circumstances, the same military force has been continued in Louisiana as was sent there under the first call, and under the same general instructions.

This simple statement of a portion only of the facts pleads with greater power than any reasoning I can use to convince every fair man of the necessity of national intervention in the affairs of this unfortunate State. It is powerless in the hands of outlaws and conspirators; it is the prey of robbers and murderers; it is in a worse condition than the absolute monarchies of the Old World, where at least order and peace can be found under the shadow of despotism.

The testimony as to political affairs in Mississippi shows a fearful state of society there, but time will not suffice me to relate the circumstances detailed. There the colored republicans have been grievously persecuted, horsewhipped, driven into canebrakes, or murdered. Judges have been spirited away; courts broken up; ballot-boxes destroyed; witnesses, struck dumb by danger, murdered; men of color mangled in death by their malignant enemies. The republicans of Mississippi look out to-day from the gloom of conspiracy, cruel oppression, and pitiless hatred.

Now, if the authority of one State can be overthrown, can be usurped, can be destroyed by a set of conspirators, why may not the authority of other States be overthrown? The wave of disaffection and anarchy, spreading wider and wider and becoming more and more powerful, may soon override the entire Union; and the national Constitution itself may be subverted and set aside by these conventions that may meet in various States and send delegates to a national convention totally in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. If we can stand by the usurpation in Arkansas, if we can indorse that, if we can say that these institutions shall stand, why may not Mississippi, why may not Louisiana, why may not Indiana and Vermont likewise overthrow their governments, contrary to the provisions of their organic law and the very foundation of society, and re-establish governments to suit the whim of a political party that may by fraud and violence obtain the mastery of States?

Now, it is time that this thing was stopped. I am not arguing as to what ought to be done in the Arkansas case; but I stand ready to say that even if we decline to interfere in the case of Arkansas we ought to prevent such action taking place in the future in any other State.

It has been found that the use of fire-arms at elections has become in many places frequent, and has led to the most serious consequences. Peaceable citizens have been driven from the polls in large numbers and deprived of the right of suffrage. The ballot-boxes have been forcibly violated by armed and lawless men. The election papers have been destroyed; unoffending citizens present at the polls have been killed by their political opponents, and the will of the people as expressed by their votes suppressed or subverted. The election precinct has been in many instances thus transformed, from a scene where order and peace and the kindest intercourse among citizens should reign, to one of terror, danger, and death. This condition of affairs has recently been proven to have taken place in various localities. The evidence taken by the committee appointed to investigate political affairs in Alabama shows that at many points in that State, on the election day in November last, the citizens in large numbers went armed to the polls; that the white men did so almost universally, and in a few instances colored men were also armed. At Spring Hill arms were provided by the white men in advance, and in the latter part of the day an attack was made upon the polls. A large number of fire-arms were discharged, and a young man killed and a peaceable citizen wounded within the room where the election officers had been doing their duties. The ballot-box and election papers were destroyed and all evidence of the will of the people annihilated by armed democrats. I quote the testimony of Judge John M. Keils, of Eufaula, upon this point. He was one of the supervisors of the election:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State whether there were any deeds of violence perpetrated within your sight or hearing on the day of the election. If so, by whom and by what party? State in what the deeds consisted.

Answer. I was at Spring Hill as United States supervisor on the day of the election, the 3d of November. That is eighteen miles from Eufaula, in the same county. Everything went along here quietly until about eleven o'clock that day, when a disturbance commenced outside. I was in the room; I did not see that, but I heard the reports of the guns; there were several guns fired; when these guns were fired the democrats present—I suppose seventy-five or one hundred—can to a house near by, Cody's store, where it was understood before that there were guns stored. They got those guns and paraded the streets there from that time until night. Some of them had two guns.

Q. What did they do with the arms?

A. They threatened to shoot anybody that did not do exactly to suit them. That was pretty generally the talk.

Q. What was the nature of their threats; were they personal, political, or how?

A. Political threats; but they would talk in this way: "We are going to make these damned negroes behave themselves. If they don't, we will kill out the last one of them." That was about the amount of it.

Q. What sort of arms were those?

A. Some of them were new double-barreled guns, and some not new. Some were rifles; but they were mostly shot-guns. There were a great many new double-barreled guns among them.

Q. Did Cody have those guns there for sale?

A. No, sir; this store was vacant.

Q. How did those guns get there?

A. I was informed that they were deposited there.

Q. When and by whom?

A. I was at Spring Hill and made a speech on Tuesday before the election, and I was notified then that those guns were in that house. I got to Spring Hill on the morning of the election, and the republican challenger, a colored man, told me that the guns were still in that house, and that he asked Cody the day before why they were there, and Cody told him they were to keep the peace on the day of the election. That colored man's name is Green Burch. He lives in Spring Hill precinct. Perhaps Cody's remark was to make the negroes behave themselves. It was something of that sort. His full name is Michael Cody. He resides at Spring Hill.

Q. Were there any United States troops there at that time?

A. There was a lieutenant and ten soldiers there.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Was that on the day of the election?

A. Yes, sir; he went up from Eufaula a day or two before the election.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where was he with his men during the election?

A. He was about three hundred yards from the polling place, and refused to go there when notified that there was going to be a disturbance, because, as he said, the captain at Eufaula had telegraphed him that morning not to go about the polling place.

By Mr. BUCKNER

Q. What was the lieutenant's name?

A. Turner.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What did his men do that day?

A. I never saw them until after the ballot-box was destroyed. One or two of them came in then.

Q. State what was done at the time the ballot-box was destroyed, and how it was destroyed.

A. The polls were closed at five o'clock, as the law requires. One of the clerks got ready to go to counting out the votes in ten or fifteen minutes. The other clerk did not get his poll-sheets ready until just at dark. The managers were hurrying, but failed to get them ready. The clerk's name was Thomas Swanson. When he got them ready he got up, without saying a word to anybody, went to the door, and opened it. That door had been barred several times to keep the crowd out, and the last time, when the crowd was very boisterous, I went and barred it myself, good and strong. It took him some time to open it. As soon as he started to that door the crowd of democrats moved to it, as though they understood what he was going there for. As soon as he got the bar from the door they ran against it and came in, and then they commenced a promiscuous firing. A portion of them ran for the light and knocked that out. The instant before the light was put out several of the crowd commenced firing, as I could see, at me, and balls did go in the wall just above my head; but that was only for an instant until the light was out, and then it was a promiscuous shooting all around that room. The managers had run away, as I found afterward, and there was no one in there but myself and my son. They did not touch me, but murdered my son.

Q. How old was your son?

A. If he had lived, he would have been seventeen years of age on the third day of this month.

Q. How was he murdered?

A. He was shot; three balls entered his thigh and one his bowels; that was the shot that killed him.

Q. Was he near you when he was hit?

A. He had his hand on my shoulder when he was hit.

Q. How soon did he die?

A. That occurred on Tuesday night, and he lived until Thursday at half past three.

Q. Where was the ballot-box destroyed?

A. It was destroyed at that time. I never saw any more after the light went out.

Q. How long after this firing did you remain in the house?

A. I can hardly tell; I could not keep much time just then, because there were twenty-five guns firing every second, or even more; I was there two or three minutes, perhaps.

Q. Did you take your son out with you?

A. During the firing, when I thought it had slacked a little, some man, whom I thought I recognized by his voice as Comer, who lives at Spring Hill Depot, called me. I asked him what he wanted. He says, "I have come here to protect you." I said, "That is all right." He came right up to me, and then, for the first time, I missed my son's hand off my shoulder, but he had told me before that he was shot. He told me that he was shot to pieces. When Comer came up I missed his hand, and felt around and could not feel him. I told Comer that I wanted to find my son; that he was shot. He said, "Wait a minute; you can't find him now." His brother and two or three others came up, and they ordered a light. One of these men went out to the door and found my son there. Three or four colored men took him and carried him up to Dr. Davis's, about three hundred yards off, and in a few minutes, the crowd around me preventing my being shot any more, guarded me up there. I went back to the polling place next morning with the lieutenant and some soldiers, and looked at the place. The contents of the ballot-box seemed to have been emptied on the floor and burned. I could see scraps of the poll-lists and ballots there. The place was riddled all around with bullets.

Q. What was said, if anything, within your hearing, about the time of the firing and of the destruction of the ballot-box?

A. The remark I heard, may be a hundred times, was: "Kill him, damn him, kill him." That was me, of course; because I was the United States supervisor in the room. I supposed that was the reason they said it.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. You were appointed by the district court as supervisor?
A. I was appointed by the United States circuit court.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there a democratic supervisor?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Where was he?
A. He had not been there for an hour before that.
Q. What was his name?
A. Dr. J. M. BATT.
Q. Were there only two supervisors for that precinct?
A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many ballots were put into the box that day?
A. Seven hundred and thirty-two.
Q. How do you know that?
A. I saw them go in.
Q. Did you keep a tally to know that that was the correct number?
A. I stood by that table all day and saw one of the inspectors number them as they came in.
Q. You saw the figures on the papers?
A. Yes, sir; and I saw the poll-lists where they were numbered.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. What was the relative strength of the parties at your poll on this day; what proportion of the seven hundred and thirty-two was republican and democratic?
A. I am satisfied that at least five-sixths were republicans.
Q. What proportion of the vote was white and colored?
A. The republicans were nearly all colored. The only white republicans that I know that voted there were one from another precinct and one who lives there.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Did none of the colored men vote the democratic ticket?
A. Yes, sir; some of them.
Q. What number?
A. I do not think more than thirty voted the democratic ticket. I can tell that for this reason: Senator SPENCER had our ticket printed in Philadelphia, on strips of paper about two and a half inches wide and about eight inches long. They were perforated on each side, like postage-stamps are, so that you could tear them apart. The democratic tickets were smooth. That is the way I could tell a republican from a democratic ticket. And besides that, I knew that crowd. I knew the colored men were nearly unanimously going to vote the republican ticket.
Q. What is the proportion of the colored and white vote in Barbour County?
A. There are about 4,100 or 4,200 republican voters in the county, and not more than 2,000 democrats.
Q. What proportion of that 2,000 democratic vote is colored, do you think? I am speaking now of the last election.
A. I do not think there are more than 1,800 white democratic voters in the county. There may have been 300 colored men in the county who voted the democratic ticket; but I do not think there were more than 200.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Where were those troops? You say there was a lieutenant and ten privates sent up to Spring Hill from Eufaula a few days before the election.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. I understand you to say they were some distance from the polls?
A. Yes, sir; about three hundred yards.
Q. Where were they about the time this disturbance took place?
A. They were at that same place.
Q. How long did that disturbance keep up? How long were you there while the firing was going on?
A. At such a time as that I could not keep time very well. It was a few minutes.
Q. Those troops still remained there and did not come up?
A. They never moved. Half or three-quarters of an hour before this disturbance commenced my son and I heard them saying out in the crowd that the Spring Hill ballot-box would control the election in the county. He said, "Now you see very plainly that that there is going to be a disturbance here. They will come in here and destroy this ballot-box, and of course they will kill you, because you are the United States supervisor here." He said, "You had better let me go after Lieutenant Turner and his men to come up here." I said, "You can go after him." I let him out of the door, and he went as far as he could walk, and came back and said that Lieutenant Turner told him that he was ordered by Captain Daggett at Eufaula not to go about the place there at all. That is something I had never suspected before. When he came back and told me that, if I could have gotten out of that door and got away I should have gone; but it would have been certain death to have undertaken to have gone. I knew that, and therefore thought the safest way would be to stay in there, which I did. The next morning I asked Turner why he did not bring his men there. I wanted to see if he would tell me what he told my son, and he showed me a dispatch that he had from Daggett that came over the wires that morning, forbidding him to go about the polling place at all, or allow his men to go there for any purpose.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he say that he was within hearing of the sound of the guns?
A. O, yes; he was within hearing.
Q. Did he say that he understood he was not to go there, even in the case of a fight or disturbance?
A. He said that that was his order from Daggett.
Q. Where is Turner now?
A. I understand that he is at Mobile. Daggett and his men left Eufaula, and Turner went with him. Next morning, after I had brought my son home—it was Friday morning—Captain Daggett came down to express sympathy, &c. I told him that it was the dispatch that he sent to Spring Hill that day to Turner that caused the destruction of the ballot-box and the murder of my son; and I told him that I considered him guilty of the murder of my son. I could not help telling him that. He explained that by saying that he had his orders from General McDowell, and showed me General Order No. 75, which McDowell gave him, which I thought never was intended to be understood as he understood it. I know, in fact, that it was not.

The result of these and other like crimes was a democratic majority in Barbour County, where the republicans number two to one of their opponents. At this time three democrats represent that county in the Legislature.

At Eufaula, a little after noon, while the citizens were voting, a difficulty occurred in the midst of a crowd of about a thousand men near the polls. Arms were drawn, firing commenced, and seven or eight men were killed on the spot and about a hundred wounded. The white men were armed almost universally, and when the firing commenced rallied toward the polls, stood their ground, cheered over the flight of the colored men, and gathered around the democratic candidate for judge, who at once mounted a box and delivered a boisterous harangue to them. A company of white democrats, who had their armory in a building above and near the polls, took arms, formed in line on the street, and remained there. The colored men in large numbers fled precipitately in all directions, and the most of them never returned to the polls. Many were so terrified as to lose their votes, which after this time could only be cast in the presence of the murderers who stood around the polls. I produce the testimony of ALEXANDER HAMILTON (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Were you here on election day and during the political campaign which has just passed?
Answer. Yes, sir. I have been here all the time.
Q. Were you engaged in the campaign?
A. I was. I am a republican.
Q. State whether you had any reason to apprehend violence on election day from what you saw.
A. I had some reason from what I could hear and from the feeling that existed among the people. I thought probably there would be something of that sort on election day.
Q. Did you or not hear any threats of violence on election day?
A. No, sir. I was at a meeting in the street here when some gentlemen were speaking, who said that there would be no danger; that the soldiers were here, and there would be no danger of anything like a riot; that the sight of a blue jacket would keep down all such as that; and I heard this remark in the crowd behind: "We'll show you on election day." I could not tell who that remark came from.
Q. Was that a republican or democrat who said there would be no trouble on election day?
A. It was Judge Keils. He was a republican.
Q. State whether or not the colored men came here armed on election day or were advised to do so?
A. No, sir. I advised them, and all of us did, not to come with any arms, telling them the soldiers were sufficient to protect them.
Q. Did they come armed?
A. I do not know that they did. I did not see any arms at all. I never saw but one pistol in a colored man's hands the whole day.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Were you a challenger on that day?
A. Yes, sir; at box No. 2.
Q. Were you present when the shooting commenced?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you notice about that?
A. The crowd rushed opposite me into a little alley, and the trouble seemed to have quelled down, and then again diagonally from me they crowded up again. Some little hallooing was done about that time, and the people all rushed away from the polls where I was stationed. I had, consequently, no need to watch the polls, and was looking toward the crowd, when I heard one pistol fire. I suppose it had been fired probably three seconds before another shot was fired, and about that time I heard police-whistles giving signals, and the firing then commenced. The very moment that it commenced I saw guns shooting out of the windows all along up-stairs in the building above.
Q. From which side of the street?
A. I did not see any from the east side, but I saw from the west side there were guns pointing out of the windows that were firing.
Q. Where were they pointed?
A. Down in the crowd.
Q. Who was in the crowd below?
A. They were all colored people.
Q. Democrats or republicans, generally?
A. The colored people here are generally republicans. There are very few democrats. When the firing commenced they stampeded in every direction down the street, east, south, and west. I do not think very many went north, because the whites were on that side of them.
Q. Who did you see shoot, so far as you saw, whites or colored?
A. I saw whites.
Q. How many whites did you see shoot?
A. I could not number them. The statement in the papers next morning was that about fifteen hundred shots were fired.
Q. As the negroes ran what did the whites do?
A. They just fired on them.
Q. Did you notice whether they fired on anybody who was running?
A. Yes, sir. Those were the men they fired on. A man who ran out of the crowd was shot dead by my side. And as they went the black men would fall to prevent being shot. They were followed a little by the whites.
Q. Immediately after the shooting was over, if anything took place about your poll, or if the whites said anything about it, state what occurred.
A. As I say, I was challenger, and was standing at the box all this time. It was nearly a hundred yards from me where the trouble had commenced. A great crowd rushed afterward to me. One of the managers rushed out and caught me by the shoulder, saying, "Come inside." That was Mr. William Braid. I went inside. Some remarks were made as to the reason the soldiers did not come. I could not say who made them. There were a great many in there. About this time one of the managers remarked that all who were in there and who did not belong must go out. The firing had then just about ceased. I stepped outside, and they were making a terrible hallooing. Hats were going up in the air, and the white men were crying, "Hurrah for the white man's party," and that was, I suppose, about a minute and a half or two minutes after the last firing that I heard.
Q. Did they cheer?
A. Yes, sir; they hallooed as I told you. About that time they said, "White men, fall in on the sidewalk;" and some said, "No, fall into a line of battle;" and they fell into a line east and west.
Q. What took place then?
A. There they stopped.
Q. What did they say about that time about the Yankees coming, or soldiers coming?

A. The cry was made, "Where are the soldiers? Why don't they come? God damn them, why don't they come? Where are your blue-jackets?"

Q. Who were making those remarks?

A. The whites. The colored people were stampeded and gone in every direction, laying behind boxes, &c.

Q. Was the impression made upon you that they wanted the soldiers to come?

A. I do not know about that.

Q. What did they say they would do in case the Yankees did come?

A. That was a general remark which they had made, saying, "Where are the blue-coats, God damn them;" and I do not suppose any gentleman said it. I always considered that a few wild-brained young fellows were making those remarks.

Q. You say that the negroes immediately ran when the firing commenced?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any colored men with arms in their hands?

A. I never saw but one colored man have a pistol the whole day. In fact, they were advised that morning to leave their pistols home that day. I heard that they were.

Q. Were you watching the riot pretty closely?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your business here?

A. I am a carpenter and a sort of contractor, and have lived here since the war. I came here as a soldier.

AARON HUNTER (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. CANNON:

Question. Have you lived in this town?

Answer. I have been raised here.

Q. Were you here on election day last November?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the riot?

A. Yes, sir. A colored man came in to vote. He was not old enough. His brother told him that he was not old enough and not to vote. The republican party wanted him first, and his brother told him that he was not old enough. They did not think so. The democratic party came in and took him off, and carried him and voted him anyhow. His brother said he was not old enough. They said he was. Mr. Charlie Goodwin said they had not anything to do with it. Any God damned man that had anything to do with it let him come to him, that he voted him. Milas Lawrence, a colored fellow, said: "By God, they had no right to do it!" When he said that Charlie Goodwin walked up to him and asked him what he got to do with it. He said, "I have got a heap to do with it. You would not let the republican party vote him, and you all took him and voted him." Clayton, a white man, said, "Shoot him"—that is, shoot Milas Lawrence. When he said that Milas Lawrence turned his back to run from Goodwin, and Goodwin stabbed him in the back with a knife, and by the time he got ten or fifteen steps from him Goodwin shot at him with his pistol, and he shot, and Clayton shot, and the whole town got shooting.

Q. Did Lawrence shoot?

A. No, sir; Goodwin and Clayton shot, and then the whole concern shot.

Q. Did you see them shoot from up-stairs?

A. Yes, sir; I saw the whole crowd. I saw the guns and shooting up there, and I was trying to get out of the way, but I could not see who was up-stairs.

Q. Did the negroes do any shooting?

A. No, sir; I saw no colored man have a gun or pistol that day.

Q. They were not armed, so far as you could see?

A. No, sir. I live out on the corporation, and the crowd that came in from the country I came in with. The negroes all broke and run.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did the negroes turn to fight at all?

A. No, sir; no colored man tried to fight at all.

Q. Did you see any armed men come down from up-stairs, and were ranged on the pavement?

A. Yes, sir; some of them ran out on the street and threw up a white handkerchief of peace, and then they came down.

Q. Then the men came down from up-stairs with the guns?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. What did they say after the shooting was over?

A. They jumped out in the street and hurrahed. Bill Dowdy said, "Go and bring your Yankees down here and we will do them the same way."

Q. Who was he referring to then?

A. I do not know; he was making that remark in the street.

Q. Did this riot keep the negroes from voting after that?

A. Yes, sir; I think it did; for I heard a great many say they would never vote, and were not going to vote.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Had you voted?

A. Yes, sir. I got shot myself; and I heard a great many more colored folks say they were not going to vote in this country any more if they did not have better laws. I was shot in the finger and calf of the leg; I was standing out in front of the polls; I could not see who hit me; I went off then, ran to get out of the way, and as I was running Ben. Hendricks shot after me once and threw his pistol at me as I was running by him. Then Jim Cranee, a policeman of the city, shot after me two or three times as I was making down the street; as I turned to go in an alley he shot at me.

Q. Were you armed that day?

A. No, sir; I heard many a colored man say that they were not going to vote any more without there were better laws made in the country. The word had always been, advising them to come without arms at all, and when they came they were run off from the polls and never allowed to vote, and shot at.

Q. Do you think it is safe for colored men to vote here now?

A. No, sir. Reub. Cobb asked me if I was shot; I told him "Yes;" he said, "Well, God damn you, you ought to have been killed." I went to Mr. Solomon to get change for a five-dollar bill; he said, "I want you to leave and go away from here; I do not want to have anything to do with you at all; I have got nothing for you to do, and do not want you to come about me."

Q. Suppose you voted the democratic ticket, could you have peace here?

A. Yes, sir; I reckon we would. They would have everything in their hands, and we would have to remain in peace and take the abuse they gave us; the colored men do not stand any more show here than a white man's dog; if I could get away from here I would go in two minutes.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Did you see the shooting?

A. I am certain of it.

Q. Did you see any colored men with pistols that day?

A. No, sir; not one.

Q. Did you see any sticks?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you hear them cursing and swearing that day?

A. No, sir; only Milas Lawrence. He only said, "God damn;" that "they had no right to vote this colored man."

Q. Do not almost all the colored men have pistols?

A. No, sir; they did not that day.

The election disturbances at Mobile were of the most serious character and involved the loss of many votes, together with bloodshed and the loss of life.

The mayor of Mobile, Mr. Moulton, was present on election day at all points in the city, and did what he could to quell riots. He discribes the situation of affairs as dangerous in the extreme to the colored men; that the whites were armed, active, aggressive, violent, and guilty of attacks with fire-arms upon the colored republicans. He is a gentleman of the highest respectability, and seemed to be free from any party bias or prejudice. He saw some two hundred mounted and armed democrats upon the street that day, and testifies that they did the shooting without provocation. His testimony is of the greatest weight, since he communicated only with democrats on election day, and he says:

All the information I derived inducing me to use the battalion of militia came from democrats.

He it was who called out the battalion clothed in the confederate uniform and filled many points with these armed and dangerous men, whose very presence inspired the colored men with terror. I quote from his testimony on pages 450 and 451:

Question. State whether or not the democrats of this city interfered with the free exercise of the right of the republican citizens to vote in any manner, and created any disturbances on that day?

Answer. There was a good deal of disturbance and bloodshed. I doubt exceedingly if there would have been any disturbance had it not been for a company of gentlemen who were on horseback on that day.

Q. Describe that company, what they did, who they were, &c.

A. I should call them a company of cavalrymen. They were not in uniform, but were armed, and paraded the streets constantly from morning until the difficulty at the court-house.

Q. How many of them were there?

A. I should judge that there were thirty or forty in that squad. They remained together all the time, and I believe there would have been no disturbance had it not been for their rashness.

Q. What was their conduct generally? What did they do to create a disturbance?

A. The shooting was done by them, although I did not see it.

Q. To what party did they belong?

A. The democratic party.

Q. What were their acts, and what was their appearance and conduct generally?

A. They were constantly riding through the streets.

Q. You say they did the shooting. Whom did they shoot, and where?

A. I did not see them shoot, although at the time of the difficulty at the court-house I was very near them. I was within ten or fifteen feet of the corner of Government and Royal streets. The shooting was done while I was there. I was running, leading a squad of my police for the purpose of arresting Allen Alexander.

Q. Whom did they shoot, as far as you could observe?

A. A colored man was killed there; I do not know his name.

Q. What did you understand to be the cause of that shooting, as to whether it was provoked or unprovoked?

A. I think it was unprovoked, unless the demonstrations of Alexander could be considered a provocation.

Q. What was your opinion as to that demonstration then and there, you being in the crowd?

A. I saw Alexander; he had left the seventh ward polling place and marched down to Government street at the head of, I should judge, forty or fifty men. The boys following him might have swelled the number perhaps to a hundred; they were unarmed, so far as I could observe. I started from the post-office building, having come down to that building for the purpose of having an interview with the Federal commander to persuade him, if possible, to co-operate in the preservation of the peace after dark, in view of my interview with Senator Hamilton. While at the corner of the building these cavalrymen rode past and shouted to me that Alexander was at the head of a mob, and was going down Government street,

Q. Where did the cavalrymen come from?

A. They came down Dauphin street. There were several polls above, and I do not know what poll they came from. I immediately ran to the central station guard-house and summoned every man to follow me. That was on Conti street, half-way through the square which led into Royal street. I ran to head Alexander off; the cavalrymen had gone in advance of me; they turned the corner of Government street and fired before I could get there; they fired one volley and then turned and came rapidly up Royal street, and I saw no more of them on that day. I saw one man lying dead on the street, and then ran from there to the armory, which was about a square off, to call out the entire force there and put them on active duty.

Q. What occurred when you got around the corner at the court-house?

A. Alexander was arrested and taken into the court-house. One man, as I say, was lying dead on the ground, and, perhaps, there were one or two wounded; one, I know, was shot through the thigh. I then went to the armory and found a squad of thirty or forty of the militia there; placed them under orders to preserve the peace.

Q. State whether you saw any one colored man make demonstrations of violence or hostility toward anybody.

A. Not the slightest on that day.

Q. State whether, at any point in the city on that day, you saw colored men making violent demonstrations toward any white men or making an attack upon any white men.

A. Not with the exception of this: About ten o'clock in the morning I was going the rounds, having traveled all day in a buggy, for the purpose of visiting the different places. There was abundance of evidence to convince me that there might at any moment be a difficulty, and I was very active, scarcely leaving my buggy on that day. While I was at the little market, opposite the jail, my attention was directed to a crowd at the jail, and I was informed that firing was going on up there, and that my presence was needed. I had about a half company of men stationed at the little market under my command, and immediately gave orders to the officer (Captain Underhill) to follow me at a double-quick. They did so, and reached the jail with me, where I found a great deal of confusion and excitement. One or two men had been shot and killed. From the jail toward the post-office building, for several squares, there were a large number of colored people, who had gone there from the seventh ward polling place. I begged them to go home, as I saw that they were in imminent danger; told them to let the election alone. Some went and others refused to go, giving as a reason that they had a right to be upon the street, and that they would not stand and see their people murdered in the way they were being. I saw they were in danger, and that the peace of the community was very seriously threatened; very few of them obeyed me.

Q. State whether the white men were in danger?

A. They were not.

Q. State whether there was any apprehension of any injury to any white men.

A. There could not possibly have been.

The testimony of George Holly, who was a challenger, shows that many citizens were overrun and intimidated on election day by violence. He demonstrates the fact that there was a complete organization, largely under the control of one Price Williams, a virulent partisan, and chairman of the democratic central committee, and that in obedience to his orders democrats went with arms in their hands to the fourth-ward polls to intercept colored voters, and that this resulted in bloodshed and murder. I quote from pages 460 and 461:

Question. State your name and residence.
Answer. My name is George Holly; I reside in Mobile.
Q. State whether you were here on election day.
A. I was.
Q. What occurred within your sight or hearing?
A. I was challenger on the day of the election at the first-ward polls in this city. On that day I saw men come up to vote who to my own knowledge had not voted. They were arrested and taken into a little house and told by parties that they would pay them so much, for instance a dollar, if they would go and vote the democratic ticket, and that if they did not they would send them to jail. I saw horsemen riding from poll to poll spotting men, to my own knowledge, who had not voted, and they were frightened away from the polls by intimidation and threats; they were driven off and did not vote at all. I saw men who were shot for attempting to vote, who were accused of inciting riots, and they were as peaceable as any men could be; all they wanted being to put in a vote and retire to their homes. Men were standing at the polls for the purpose of keeping those persons back, and they were crowded back and could not get in their vote. They were threatened to be turned off, and in fact were turned off, because they attempted to vote according to the dictates of their conscience.
Q. State how many men you know of being intimidated from voting on that day by threats of violence.
A. I am satisfied there was not less than from three to five hundred votes lost. At the second-ward polls I saw Mr. Price Williams come out of his office. He was informed that some men were coming from the seventh-ward polls who could not vote there on account of intimidation, and a man by the name of Alexander was bringing them down to vote. He came out and said, "Gentlemen, all you who desire to carry this election and are determined to carry it, go straight to the fourth-ward polls; there are some men coming there from the seventh ward who are going to vote there. Go down and see to it that they do not do so."
Q. Where was Price Williams when he said that?
A. Out on Royal and Saint Michael streets.
Q. To whom did he speak?
A. He was speaking generally. There was a large crowd, and they were there for the business of keeping men from intimidating the people.
Q. Where were these men whom Price Williams spoke to, and what was the occasion of the assembly?
A. They were on Royal street, close to the second-ward polls: they were there for that business, and were appointed for that business. When he spoke to them they all repaired to the fourth-ward polls. Not five minutes after that the shooting took place, and a man who lives near my house was killed and others were wounded. I think there were two wounded on that day.
Q. What were those men doing that were killed and wounded?
A. They were killed and wounded at the fourth-ward polls, where they went to vote.

The testimony of George Turner, on page 465, shows that there were a large number of armed white men at the polls in Mobile on election day, bent on the most fatal purposes. He says he saw more pistols in the hands of the white men that day in the crowd than he ever saw in his life. He "did not see a single colored man with arms."

Question. Were you supervisor at the fourth ward on the day of election?
Answer. I was.
Q. Do you know of a riot in that ward about four o'clock?
A. I did not see it.
Q. What did you hear about it?
A. I was on duty there, acting as supervisor. Shortly before the firing occurred a courier came up and announced that Allen Alexander was coming down to the ward with a crowd to vote.
Q. What do you mean by a courier?
A. A man on horseback.
Q. Not a deputy sheriff?
A. I don't remember who he was. That announcement created a great excitement in the crowd. There were four or five hundred white men around the polls. Soon after somebody ran around the corner and said they were coming. Then some man in the crowd cried, "Boys, let us go and meet them," and the polls were instantly deserted. Four or five hundred white men were there, at a rough guess, although there might not have been so many. They immediately rushed around the court-house toward where Alexander was coming.
Q. Did you see any arms drawn at that time, or hear any expressions used?
A. I saw more pistols in the hands of that crowd who were rushing around there than I ever saw before in my life. When they rushed around they drew their arms, a great portion of them, and started to the corner to meet the negroes.
Q. State whether they kept two or three or four hundred white men there all day at the polls?
A. They did, constantly.
Q. Were those white men who drew their arms and rushed around the corner to meet Alexander democrats?
A. Yes, sir; they were.
Q. Did you see anything that occurred around there?
A. I was supervisor, and did not think that I ought to leave the boxes out of my sight, and consequently I did not follow them around, but heard firing almost immediately after they got around there.
Q. Did you see that they had arms in their hands?
A. There was only one man whom I could identify, and I do not know his name. I did not see a single colored man with arms in his hands, although I saw an immense number of white men with arms in their hands.
Q. What became of the colored men? Did they remain on the ground?
A. The white men all came back; but after that hardly ten colored men came to the polls. I do not think that over fifteen or twenty colored men voted after that. To the best of my knowledge that was between three and four o'clock. I did not hear any cause assigned why those men should not be permitted to go there and vote.
Q. Did you see the dead man lying on the street?
A. No, sir.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. What are your politics?
A. I am a republican.
Q. What is your business?
A. Practicing law.
Q. All you know is that the men rushed off? Did the negroes rush off with them?
A. There were only a few negroes there; they disappeared in that direction.
Q. The crowd all went together, black and white?
A. Yes, sir. The bulk of the crowd was white men, and they disappeared around the corner toward where Alexander was coming.

The testimony further shows that the white men, who are almost unanimously democrats, were well armed with pistols and other deadly weapons; that during the day several military companies of the city, both infantry and artillery, were brought under arms and marched through the streets and in the neighborhood of the polls. These companies were composed of white democrats, and were called out as the mayor says to keep the peace, then threatened by armed and lawless men in various parts of the city. During the day armed and mounted men patrolled the streets, threatening colored voters and heading them off from the polls; armed couriers were riding in all directions from poll to poll, and white citizens on foot at all points were prepared for a deadly conflict. In the forenoon arrests of colored men were made and they were being taken to the jail, a large crowd followed, firing began, one colored man was killed, others were wounded, and the white armed democrats drove in precipitate haste their colored fellow-citizens from the streets.

At or very near the fourth ward polls a large number of colored men, numbering from two to three hundred, coming there from the seventh ward polls, was met by armed democrats, mounted and on on foot, were intercepted and attacked by men with fire-arms; one man was instantly killed, others were wounded; the white men rallied near the court-house and the polls, while the colored men fled in the wildest dismay and confusion. Many were so intimidated by these occurrences, the news of which spread rapidly over the entire city, that they did not approach the voting places; others remained at home, and others on the way turned back to avoid the dangers that beset their exercise of the right of suffrage. These facts are attested by the oaths of a large number of witnesses, not one of whom of either party stated that the white citizens of Mobile who attended the election were unarmed; while those who had the most knowledge of the facts concurred in saying that the white citizens were thoroughly organized and completely armed. I refer to the testimony of some of the eye-witnesses of the facts as they occurred on that day so disgraceful in the annals of Mobile. Mr. M. C. Osborne, who was the chief deputy marshal on election day, and who was during the whole time riding over the city, testifies as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name and what position you occupied during the recent election.
Answer. My name is M. C. Osborne. I was appointed by General Healy as his chief special deputy marshal on the day of the election.
Q. State where you were during election day.
A. I was riding over the city from poll to poll, and was at all the polling places several different times.
Q. State what occurrences of an unusual nature happened in your presence on that day in connection with the election, if any.
A. I saw a great deal of activity among the democratic party, and those particularly who were on horseback. I think there were one or two hundred of them riding around from poll to poll in a very excited manner all day long, giving orders. What the object of it was I cannot say, but the effect of it was to intimidate the colored voters, and a great many of them left the polls.
Q. How many mounted men were there?
A. I should think, to state it within bounds, that there were over two hundred.
Q. Who were those mounted men; were they soldiers, citizens, sheriffs, or marshals?
A. All whom I knew were citizens; some of them were deputy sheriffs.
Q. Were there some who were mere democratic partisans?
A. Yes, sir; I should think one-half of them were of that character.
Q. State what they did, so far as you could see.
A. One or two of them I knew by name. I do not know whether they were deputy sheriffs or not. Captain Dannar was in command of one squad of men, and he was in at the first killing, as they call it here. A colored man was killed near the jail. The report was that they were fighting in the seventh ward, and I went there and found that the difficulty had occurred several blocks beyond, over at the jail. I saw the man who was shot, and met Captain Dannar at the head of his squad, riding away from there.
Q. Did he say anything?
A. Not to me.
Q. Were those men armed?
A. I did not see them have any arms. I do not know whether they were armed or not.
Q. Did you ever hear that they were armed?
A. I heard of their shooting.
Q. State whether you know anything else as to the effect of their operations on that day.
A. I noticed a great many of them at the fight at the court-house, and while I did not reach there in time to see any of the shooting, yet these very men I noticed were there and seemed to be more excited than anybody else, and were giving orders, and appeared to be the leaders of the trouble.
Q. What were they doing when you came in sight of the court-house?
A. They were standing on Government street. Every man seemed to be talking and boasting and laughing over the riot, which had just ceased as I came up.
Q. What was the nature of their conversation? Did you say that they were boasting and laughing?
A. Yes, sir; they said that they had cleaned out one negro crowd, and now they were ready for the carpet-baggers and scalawags; that it was time to go into them now. The dead man was lying right there.
Q. Did these men make any attempt to help him or treat him with any degree of humanity?
A. No, sir.
Q. How long did he lay there?
A. He was lying while I was there about ten minutes. I went to the custom-house and back again, and when I returned he had been taken away.
Q. State what you or the republicans did, if anything, to preserve order and peace during that day in this city?
A. I did all that was in my power to do as the chief marshal. Before the elec tion, in consequence of talk and threats that were made here, I went to Montgomery on purpose to see General Healy; told him that I thought the force of one hundred marshals would be powerless here, as several men had told me that they had two or three thousand old soldiers, and had determined to carry the election that day or wade through blood.

Q. How many deputy marshals had you?
A. I think I had a hundred and four.
Q. State whether they were able to prevent disorder and riot that day.
A. No, sir; they were powerless.
Q. Why so?
A. They were powerless in the face of so many determined men; they just carried the marshals away. I believe they picked up the marshals in the eighth ward and carried them off. I know that from their statements.
Q. State whether those deputy sheriffs interfered with your marshals or not.
A. I do not think they did.
Q. Who was it that interfered?
A. The citizens at the eighth-ward polls.
Q. And at other places?
A. Yes, sir.

The testimony of Gustavus Horton, an old white citizen, who was probate judge, discloses facts of a startling character:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. What is your name, age, and residence?
Answer. My name is Gustavus Horton; age, sixty-six; I reside in Mobile, and have lived here thirty-seven years.
Q. State whether you were present in this county during the last political campaign and during the recent election.
A. I was.
Q. State the condition of the public mind during that time between the two parties, and particularly whether either side intimidated the other or used any unlawful means to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage.
A. The feeling, I think, on the part of the democratic party was as intense and bitter as it was in 1861.
Q. What was the nature of their conduct; how was that feeling manifested?
A. In their organization. Almost every house was visited, the names of the voters were taken down in a registration, and intimation made that they must vote in a certain way.
Q. State whether any persons were intimidated by threats of violence.
A. On the day previous to the election, or within a day or two, the business men were requested—and it amounted to an order—to close their stores that they might attend to the election, which is a thing I have never seen before in this city.
Q. State what occurred immediately previous to the election and on election day within your observation.
A. Heavy contributions were levied upon the merchants to carry on the election. On the day of the election I at intervals went to three or four of the polls, although being in office I could not spend a great deal of time on the street. I was judge of probate. A large part of the young men of the city were on horseback and, to a considerable extent, surrounded the polls, and that had the effect of intimidating voters, particularly in certain localities.
Q. What class of voters were intimidated?
A. I think the colored men were intimidated.
Q. How many do you suppose were prevented from exercising the right of suffrage?
A. My own idea is that, with a free, unbiased election there would have been a thousand more votes polled in the country than were polled.
Q. What was the conduct of these armed and mounted men?
A. They surrounded the polls and crowded up.
Q. How close did they get to the polls on their horses?
A. They would be within twelve to fifteen or twenty feet of them.
Q. Did they display their arms?
A. I could not see their arms, except as they were used during the day, but they were on horseback, which is a very unusual thing; I never saw it before in this city.
Q. Were they standing in the midst of the crowd around the polls on their horses?
A. Yes, sir; and then they would ride off and communicate from one ward to the other; that had the effect, I am satisfied, of intimidating the colored people and preventing them from voting. They are a timid race and dread anything that has the appearance of danger.

The testimony of Reuben Selas is to the effect that a large number of colored men approaching the polls near the court-house after three o'clock p. m. were met and cut off by a body of armed democrats, who killed two of them and wounded others, scattering and driving them off; that they then laughed and cheered over their victory, exulting over the corpse of a dead colored man who laid near them in the street, saying that "They had killed one damned son of a bitch, and he was out of the way." They then threw up their hats and waved them over the victory they had won. I quote a part of his testimony in further confirmation of what I say:

REUBEN SELAS sworn and examined:

Question. Were you here before the election, and were you present during the election in this city?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know anything about any riots which occurred on election day, or any trouble? And if so, state what it was.
A. I was down on Government street the day of the election, about half past three o'clock. Allen Alexander came walking down from the seventh ward. I suppose there were about two hundred men in the street following him, and about twenty-five or thirty young fellows walking behind him. They came walking, laughing, and talking, along, and said they supposed that there was about 500 majority in the seventh ward from what they had learned. I asked them where they were going, and they said down to the fourth ward to vote, saying that they were afraid of being killed if they undertook to go to the seventh ward. Those were colored republicans.
Q. How many were there?
A. I suppose about two hundred of them.
Q. Were they moving along with Alexander?
A. Yes, sir; there were twenty-five or thirty close to him. They said they were afraid of being killed, as men had been killed there already at the jail. They said Allen Alexander told them he thought it was better for them to go around there. When Allen Alexander got in front of the court-house, a company of men, with A. C. Doman and Mr. McGill, and another gentleman named James Manette, came around from the poll and cried out to arrest him; some also cried, "Kill him." Manette got down off his horse and grabbed one man in the collar and cried, "Kill the damned son of a bitch," and shot the man, who was a colored man; he was a republican.
Q. What was the man doing?
A. He was not doing anything at all. It seems when they had hold of Allen Alexander, this man came up to see what was being done. James Manette also took hold of Allen Alexander.
Q. How far was the man who was shot away from Allen Alexander?
A. The man was standing about five feet in front of him.
Q. How did he come to shoot him?
A. I do not know about that. Somebody or another commened shooting before that. I saw James Manette shoot four times.
Q. Who did he shoot at?
A. He shot at a colored man.
Q. Who else did he shoot at?
A. He ran across the street after that and shot at a man, or two men. One man he shot through the arm. I suppose it was him.
Q. Did anybody else do any firing?
A. Yes, sir; there might have been a dozen shots fired. It scared me so that I jumped in a hall-way. The man that Manette shot at and hit through the arm is now dead.
Q. What was said about that time?
A. I could not say. They were all swearing and saying, "Kill the damned sons of bitches."
Q. Was that said by democrats or republicans?
A. It was said by democrats, because the republicans there were afraid to say anything.
Q. Were the republicans armed?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you see any of the republicans do any shooting?
A. No, sir.
Q. How long did this firing keep up?
A. I think it must have lasted five or six minutes.
Q. What became of the colored people after the firing?
A. Nearly all of them ran.
Q. How many white men were there left there?
A. When I got outside of the hall door there was a crowd of white men standing on the sidewalk.
Q. Were the white men all left standing there after the colored men ran off?
A. The bigger part of them were.
Q. Did the white men run?
A. I don't think they did. Twelve of the white men I know had these big long pistols.
Q. Had they their arms exposed?
A. They had them out. I saw that. That was the same time they came up to take Alexander.
Q. When you came out of your hiding-place did you hear the white men say anything?
A. They were laughing and talking about the men they had killed. They threw up their hats and waved them about the victory they had won.
Q. Where was the dead man then?
A. He was lying between the railroad track and the sidewalk.
Q. How far was that from the white men?
A. I suppose about ten feet.
Q. Did they come and pick up this dead man?
A. Some went there after the colored people ran. The crowd of white men came up to his body after I came out of the hall.
Q. Did the white men cheer while the dead man was lying there?
A. Yes, sir; they were right on the sidewalk in front of him, between him and the court-house.
Q. How long did he lay there before anybody came to pick him up?
A. I could not tell exactly how long. Mr. Osborne had time to go away and get a few soldiers from the custom-house yard and go back before that man was taken up.
Q. Did the soldiers pick this man up or did his friends pick him up?
A. I don't know exactly who did it. I went away. He was laying on the ground when I went away.
Q. Was anything said about the election when they were hurrahing and cheering there?
A. There was so much said that I cannot recollect it. They said they had killed that damned son of a bitch, and he was one out of the way. Somebody asked what they had done with Allen Alexander; whether they had killed him. They said no; and then somebody said, "Damn him, he is one that ought to be killed."
Q. Did they say why?
A. He is a man of judgment, and he instructs the people. He is more intelligent than the common run of people.
Q. Is he a leading man among the republicans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Does he make speeches?
A. Sometimes.
Q. What does he do here?
A. He has been working in the custom-house, I think.
Q. Did they say why Alexander ought to have been killed?
A. Not that I know of.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How many men were killed or shot at that same time?
A. On Government street, to my knowledge, there were two. Other witnesses state there were three.
Q. Did you see any of the colored men fire?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did the colored men make an attack on anybody?
A. No, sir.
Q. What was the effect of that shooting on the two hundred colored men going to vote; did they go on and vote, or did they scatter and leave?
A. They scattered and left. They were afraid to go and vote.
Q. Were there many colored men in the city who did not vote on account of that difficulty?
A. Yes, sir; I believe that there were over five hundred who did not vote, from what they told me.
Q. Do you mean five hundred republicans?
A. Yes, sir; they did not vote on account of those riots.
Q. Did they say they were afraid to vote?
A. Yes, sir; and they were afraid on account of those cadets who were brought out. The colored people here are afraid of them.
Q. Who are those cadets?
A. They wear gray suits, and they are called the State militia, I think.
Q. They do not belong to the United States Army?
A. No, sir; after they brought them out I saw no colored people hardly that voted afterward; they said they were afraid of those men; these men threatened what they were going to do to the negroes.
Q. Were you there at the time Alexander started with his men?
A. I was not at the seventh ward when he started.
Q. You spoke about the two or three hundred white men going about from poll to poll to vote. How do you know about that?
A. I followed the crowd that day, and I saw them do it; they do it boldly here, and there is no protection against it. If a colored man says anything about it he is apt to be shot. I am here now as a witness, and I am afraid of being killed after I go out of this room.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Who do you think will kill you?

A. Those same men against whom I have come here as a witness will be more than apt to do it. There are crowds of colored men in this city to-day who are araid.

Q. Do not these colored men have arms?

A. Some few of them have pistols, but they are afraid to show them.

Q. Why don't they fight back, and arm themselves?

A. They have arms and pistols, but in this town and in the country they are afraid to let it be known. If a colored man who has been out hunting comes into town with a gun, a crowd of men are looking after him and saying that if he don't mind he will be killed, or that he ought to be killed. There are nearly sixty witnesses here now who will tell you it is the same way in the country, and worse, if anything. If a man owes us a debt, and we ask him for it once and he refuses to pay, we dare not go to him again.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you mean to say that you do not dare in this country to collect debts which the white man owes you?

A. I mean to say that if a white man refuses to pay you the first time and you go back to him again, you will be either locked up in prison or knocked over the head with a club or may be killed at night.

Q. Is there not justice for the colored man here?

A. No, sir; I don't think there is. I have been voting the republican ticket since the surrender, and now if an election occurred to-morrow I would be afraid to go to the polls. The colored men here are afraid of the democrats.

I will now quote from the testimony of Allen Alexander, a prominent colored man, who during a part of the day took a leading part among his colored republican friends. He saw the difficulties in the way of republicans voting at the seventh ward, and induced a large number who had not yet voted to follow him to the fourth ward to vote. He was met, arrested, and carried off to jail, while the crowd with him was fired into by armed democrats. Two colored men were killed, others were wounded; the voters fled away. Neither he nor those with him had committed any crime nor even breach of the peace, and yet he was indicted in the State court, and not one of the white men who assailed him and his friends has been arrested or indicted in the State courts. This testimony is uncontradicted. The testimony of some democrats is to the effect that he and his friends went along the street rapidly and in a boisterous and threatening manner, but no attack was made, no violence was shown to any one, not even a threat was heard. This unoffending company of voters was met by a troop of armed and mounted ruffians and ruthlessly attacked with deadly weapons, not one of whom has been prosecuted for his crimes in the State courts. He also testifies to the fact that the members of the city battalion took by stealth their arms at night from the armory just before the election to be ready for their use on that day. I quote from his testimony:

ALLEN ALEXANDER (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name, age, and residence?

Answer. My name is Allen Alexander; I am thirty-three years of age; and I reside in Mobile.

Q. State whether you were in this town during the last political campaign and at the election?

A. I was.

Q. State what occurred here on election day within your sight and hearing which was calculated to disturb the peace and prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage?

A. I was on the street all day from day-break until I was put in jail. At the seventh ward particularly the democrats were crowding and challenging the colored men. They commenced that early in the morning, at the opening of the polls, arresting the colored men and taking them to jail. For instance, if a colored man came up to vote some democrat would say he has voted, or he don't live here, or something of that sort; and the democrats had stationed at each polling place a justice of the peace, who had established an office near by. At the court-house there was an office inside. At the seventh ward there was one within twenty steps of the voting place. Upon complaint of any democrats, the deputy sheriffs would arrest the man and carry him before this justice of the peace, who would commit the man to jail. And that, as I say, started early in the morning, and was continued at every ward during the day. At the seventh ward two colored men were arrested in that manner on the charge of having voted twice, and the deputy sheriffs were taking them to jail, and the men were shot on the way.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Do you say they shot the two colored men who were arrested, while on their way to jail?

A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who shot them?

A. They were shot by the men who arrested them. I didn't see that.

Q. State what occurred within your sight and hearing?

A. In the evening, after going around to the other wards, I went back to the seventh ward, and several colored men informed me that they were afraid to vote; that if they attempted to do so they were taken to jail, and that two men had already been shot in going to jail. They asked me what to do. I was in a buggy and stood up and spoke to them, saying, "If you cannot vote here without interruption, go to the Fourth ward, where you have some white friends; you can vote there. All who have not voted go to the fourth ward. You who have voted go home; for if you stay here you will get into trouble." I started off, two or three hundred following me. From what they said, I supposed they had not voted. As soon as we started off a lot of white democrats started on horses. There were between twenty and thirty on horses.

Q. Were they armed or unarmed?

A. They were armed.

Q. Who were they? What was the company called?

A. They were called deputy sheriffs. They rode to the fourth ward, where I proceeded. Some of them, however, went to all of the wards and as I understood notified a certain number of men to go to the fourth ward to meet me and the men with me. When we arrived on Government street we found that they had formed a regular line of battle across the street between us and the voting place.

Q. How far did you have to go from the seventh to the fourth ward?

A. Seven or eight blocks.

Q. How far did you get on the way?

A. We had gone about a quarter of a mile and had got within one block of the voting place.

Q. Describe that line of battle?

A. They formed a line of democrats across Government street, the most of them dismounting.

Q. Had they arms or not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could you see their arms?

A. I saw some of them. Their line reached across the street. I went on and got half way of the block, between Saint Emanuel street and Government street, when I stopped and told the colored men to remain and let me go ahead. They did so, and I then went across Government street toward the sheriff, whom I saw standing there. Before I got to him, being within two or three steps of him, a man named James Manette jumped off his horse. He led the crowd on horseback. After jumping off he grabbed me, and a number of them jumped around me. Some said, "Shoot him; kill him; the damned son of a bitch; the damned nigger," &c. The sheriff said, "No; let us take him to jail and arrest him." The sheriff then put me into a buggy, and as soon as I was put in shooting commenced. Manette shot at a colored man who came up close to me. He struck him with a stick first, and afterward shot him; and shooting commenced then generally from the democrats on the colored men. There was not a shot fired from the republicans or colored men.

Q. Were you in the buggy and able to see over the crowd at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was said, if anything, by the democrats at that time?

A. They said, "Shoot him; kill him."

Q. Did you see anybody fall?

A. The one that was nearest to me was killed. I saw him lying four or five feet from me dead in the street. I heard the report of pistols, and looked around, thinking they had shot me, when I saw him fall.

Q. Were you acquainted with the man personally?

A. Yes, sir; I knew him when I saw him.

Q. What was his name?

A. I think it was Kinney. I was not particularly acquainted with him.

Q. State whether the democrats let him lie there or whether they picked him up.

A. He was lying there when they took me away.

Q. Did you hear any cheering over their victory, or any shouts?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did they do?

A. They hallooed and yelled, and drove all the colored men off except myself.

Q. Which way did they go? Did they come back or did they go toward the fourth ward poll?

A. They went back in the street.

Q. Did the colored men fire and shoot?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did they throw anything, or resist?

A. Not at all.

Q. Were they armed?

A. No, sir; that is, I saw no arms.

Q. How long did they keep you in jail?

A. Until the next evening.

Q. Had they a writ for your arrest?

A. No, sir; they took me without a writ. Some of the democrats wanted to kill me, and some wanted to protect me.

Q. Are the cadets republicans or democrats?

A. They are all democrats. You might, perhaps, pick out half a dozen republicans among them.

Q. Were they armed?

A. Yes, sir; with breech-loading guns.

Q. How many are there?

A. I do not know how many companies there are. There is a battalion commanded by a man named Higley.

Q. These mounted men were called deputy sheriffs?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was Manette one of them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is Manette now?

A. He is in the city.

Q. What has ever been done with those men who seized you and shot at the colored men?

A. I think nothing. I think Manette, McGill, and Danner were arrested by the United States commissioner. The judge elected on that day, whose name was Semmes, impaneled a special grand jury a few days afterward, which investigated the matter, and they only indicted me. I was indicted for inciting a riot.

Q. Was that in the State court?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. They did not indict any white democrats?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why did they not take the regular grand jury?

A. I do not know. They have one at each term.

Q. Who was this judge?

A. O. J. Semmes, the son of the rebel admiral, Semmes.

Q. Is Semmes a democrat?

A. O, Lord, yes.

Q. Then you were the only person who was indicted for the trouble which occurred on the streets that day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you been tried?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is the indictment now pending?

A. Yes, sir. It is pending in the city court.

Q. Did anything else occur during the campaign calculated to inspire republicans with terror in the exercise of their political rights?

A. Nothing except the speaking. They would boldly threaten, every time they spoke, that they intended to have the election or blood.

Q. Was anything of that kind said in the newspapers, or was it said in speeches?

A. It was said in speeches. They were very bitter. You could hear them every night.

Q. Did that have an effect upon the colored people here to keep them from the polls and to intimidate them?

A. Yes, sir; these threats, together with the acts of violence a few days before the election, had an effect. The members of the different companies of that battalion took all of the guns at night out of the armory.

Q. Where did they take them to?

A. I do not know. They were stolen out. They have an armory here in the city building.

Q. Do they usually keep the arms there?

A. Yes, sir; and near the time of the election they were all taken out. When they go to drill they go there and get them. They were carried off at night, at different times.

Q. How was that found out?

A. It slipped out that the guns were missing.

Q. Was the taking done publicly? Did they march there and take them away?

A. O, no; it was done at night. That was found out, as I say, and had the effect of inspiring the colored people with terror.

I now quote from the testimony of S. H. Davis, janitor at the mayor's office. He shows that the firing was begun by the democrats and not returned by the republicans. He himself was shot.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name, age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. My name is S. H. Davis. I was born in 1848, and have been living here since my childhood.
Q. State whether you were here during the last campaign and election.
A. I was.
Q. Are you a republican?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what you saw on the day of election in this city.
A. I saw a great deal of excitement, shooting, and carrying to jail; in fact, I got shot myself.
Q. Where were you when you were shot?
A. I was shot on Government street, between Saint Emanuel and Royal streets. I was shot through the right thigh.
Q. State who shot you and how it occurred.
A. That I cannot say. I was janitor at the mayor's office, in the municipal building. I went out on the street and saw a great crowd. I saw men on horses with pistols in their hands, and as I got down half way of the block these men on horseback commenced firing. I turned back to go up into the building, and as I did so I received a shot. I do not know from whom it came, nor who shot me. I was going down town at the time to obtain some money to pay my house-rent.
Q. Had you any arms in your hand?
A. I had none.
Q. Were you attacking or assaulting anybody?
A. No, sir.
Q. What did you do after you were shot?
A. I came to the guard-house. It was shut up, and I then got a hack and went home.
Q. State whether anybody else was shot or not, or whether any other shots were fired at that time.
A. A man named William Kinney was killed.
Q. How close were you to him?
A. I did not see him. They told me he was killed.
Q. Did you see these men, with Allen Alexander at their head, coming up the street?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were you shot after he was arrested, or before?
A. Before.
Q. Did you see a line of armed men across the street anywhere?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know whether any colored people were kept from the polls through fear?
A. There were several of them. If a man went up to vote the white people would say that he voted twice, and would carry him to jail, and they became afraid and would not vote. In fact, I came near not voting myself on that account.
Q. Did you see any of them chased away from the polls?
A. My brother-in-law and uncle became afraid and did not vote.
Q. Were any of the negro men armed that you saw when you came around by the government building?
A. No, sir; the cadets were the only armed men that I saw.

These facts lead to the conclusion that the presence of fire-arms at the polls is dangerous in the extreme, and that a stringent law should be enacted forbidding their use. Voters are deprived of their rights, the will of the people is thwarted, the peace is broken, life is sacrificed, and anarchy inaugurated. The bill proposed is intended to apply a proper remedy. What occurred at the places named gives warrant for the belief that the white people of Alabama are in a great measure armed, and that they stand ready on election day to use their arms to enforce their political faith, regardless of the peace of society and the lives of their neighbors. And what is true of Alabama may reasonably be supposed to be so of the adjoining States, since the population is homogeneous.

The right to bear arms is, in many instances, a valuable one; but in the exciting occurrences of elections they become dangerous auxiliaries to bad men, and afford temptations to violence which cannot be resisted. Every view of the facts leads irresistibly to the conclusion that their use should be peremptorily forbidden under severe penalties. By the bill their possession openly or secretly on election day is made presumptive evidence of the felonious intent of the bearer to use them in violation of law.

It is time, if the State authorities will not intervene in this matter, that the authorities of the General Government should intervene. If we do not do it many parts of the country will be surrendered to the disgrace, the ignominy, the infamy, and the outrages that prevail in all the Spanish-American republics that border upon us and in that country which adjoins us on the southwest. If there is any place within our country that should be peaceable and quiet it is the polls on election day. They should be as sacred as even the churches, the place of worship of the living God, themselves are; and if we cannot have peace and honor on election day and freedom for our citizens, we had as well surrender our Republic at once.

Now the next part of the bill provides for protecting the people from frauds on election day and provides for the preservation of the ballots. It provides for all those guards which can be thrown around the ballot-box; it provides that the supervisors of the country districts shall have the same authority that the supervisors have in cities. It gives the best plan for inspecting the votes and guarding against fraud and seeing what is done at the ballot-box and to see what is going on that is wrong or illegal. Now has any democrat any objection to that? Has any republican? Why should not two men, one of each party, stand by the sacred ballot-box from the first moment the ballot is cast until the last ballot is taken out, and fairly and fully see that everything is done fairly and that recorded evidence in reference to it is safely preserved? Why should any man say that unusual power is given to prevent frauds of that kind? And why should not men be endowed with authority from the United States for this purpose? Why should they not stand around the polls to see that the laws are not violated? Who fears a United States marshal unless it be the offender? Who fears the searching eye of the supervisor unless it be some fraudulent voter that wants to stuff the ballot-box or change the evidence of the people's will? No honest man fears it, no man who wants the will of the people carried out fears the eye of the supervisor or the arm of the United States marshal. These gentlemen who talk about the odium that is to be thrown upon the people of the country by having the officers and marshals of the United States Government surrounding the polls on the day of the election are not in favor of a free and fair election, but are willing to see the rights of the electors snatched from them by fraud and violence. I can interpret their conduct in no other way.

Another difficulty that besets the voter is the possibility of a refusal of the registration officers to make the proper registry, and the deprivation of the right of suffrage by this means. A recent occurrence of this kind took place at Mobile, at the municipal election which was held under a law passed in December last by the Legislature which is now in session. The time for registration was fixed at six days, and the officers in the ward in which there was a heavy preponderance of negro votes decided to register white and colored men by turns. This created delays; the whites, being few, registered slowly, and hundreds of negroes were worn out and left without registry. This is a cheap method of carrying an election, and done under the forms of law furnishes an admirable illustration of the spirit of a party that has resolved through law or over law to obtain and hold the mastery. I quote from the testimony of Mayor Moulton, of Mobile, on page 454:

Q. The question was whether the colored people have been treated fairly in elections, and otherwise, by the white democrats. Have they had a fair registration or not in this city recently?
A. There was a great deal of complaint with reference to that. The law upon its face was a fair law, I think, but in its operations perhaps there were several hundred colored men who were not afforded an opportunity to register. That was at the municipal election a few days ago. I cannot explain that.
Q. Did they give them time to register?
A. It was owing to the want of time.
Q. How much time had they to register?
A. One week.
Q. How was this registration conducted?
A. I know very little about it; I was called at one time to accompany Sheriff Parker to the seventh ward where there was a great deal of dissatisfaction as to the manner in which the registration was progressing. That is a ward where the colored element largely predominates; this occurred on Friday, then the fifth day of the registration. I think they had not reached a thousand, and there were about eighteen hundred or two thousand colored voters in the ward, which was one of the heavy negro wards. It was the seventh ward; the heaviest negro wards in the city being the first, sixth, and seventh.
Q. State whether or not the white men were fully registered in this city at the recent election?
A. I heard no complaint about that.
Q. What was the complaint about?
A. There was some complaining at the seventh ward about tardiness.
Q. How many colored men were excluded from registration, as you understand?
A. I suppose at the seventh ward, judging from former elections, that six or eight hundred were excluded.
Q. The question came up whether the colored men have been treated fairly or not recently in this State. Within your knowledge, has a white man ever been convicted for the murder of a colored man in the State of Alabama?
A. I never heard of such a case since their freedom.

I also quote from the testimony of George Holly, on page 461:

Question. Did your men all get an opportunity to register at the first ward at the last city election?
Answer. No, sir.
Q. Were they excluded from doing so?
A. They were threatened and were afraid to go up and register. They were intimidated and scared at the last election; were afraid to venture up even to register. At the seventh ward, where I frequently was, men crowded there to register, and were prohibited from so doing. They had a rule, so they said, at the registering place that one democrat should be registered and then one republican. Sometimes there would be fifty republicans, and perhaps not one democrat.
Q. Would they not then register until a democrat came?
A. They would not. They would delay by asking questions, as to where a man lived, on what street, who lived next to him, what was his employment or business, how old he was, what day he was born, &c.
Q. By that means they filled the time up and kept them from registering?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many colored men were kept from registering?
A. I had a note of eighty-odd men. It is not with me, but from recollection I can state that there were at least three hundred, from that to five hundred, prevented.

The fourth section of the bill is intended to provide against this despicable trickery under the forms of law and to open the way to every voter who is entitled to registry to have it without danger from the malice or the villainy of his political foes.

The fifth section of the bill provides against the fraudulent or forcible destruction of the ballot-boxes, ballots, and election papers, looking to their preservation as evidence of the election.

The sixth section makes the killing of any one in the commission of any one of the foregoing crimes murder—a provision certainly salutary and founded upon just principles.

The seventh section provides for jurisdiction of these offenses in the United States courts. The testimony shows that the State courts take no cognizance of these political crimes against colored men, and there is but one instance known in the State of Alabama in which a white man has been punished by a State court since the war for killing a colored man.

The eighth and ninth sections provide for supervisors, with the same powers and duties as they now have in cities having over twenty thousand inhabitants. These are necessary and important provisions and a part of the machinery requisite to insure fairness at elections. The tenth section provides for the counting of the votes before adjournment of the election board, and a public declaration of the result. The eleventh section provides that no additional expense shall be put upon the Government by reason of the creation of additional supervisors and marshals. Section 12 provides for the preservation of all the papers and ballots until after the first session of Congress after the election.

The thirteenth section provides for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, as provided in section 4 of the act of April, 1871, with the additional causes contemplated in the first and second sections of the bill; and is as follows:

SEC. 13. That whenever in any State or part of a State the unlawful combinations named in section 5299 of the Revised Statutes, and in the first and second sections of this act, shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able, by violence, to either overthrow or set at defiance the constituted authorities of said State, and of the United States within said State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and during the continuance of such rebellion, and within the limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when, in his judgment, the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the President shall first have made proclamation, as provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse.

This section contemplates combinations of men with unlawful purposes organized, numerous, powerful, able to defy the law—able to meet and overthrow either the State or national authority; or the other more dreadful alternative, and that is that the local authorities are in complicity with or connive at the crimes of these organized outlaws; or what is more shocking, that the courts of justice, the very fountains of fair dealing in society, are so poisoned that the violaters of law, the unhung desperadoes who scoff at human rights, cannot be tried and punished for their crimes. When these things shall have happened, then the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended, and not until then. Then the President, in his discretion, may declare that a rebellion exists there and use military power to put it down. When civil authority in all branches is cast down, then military authority is to step in; not till then. If such a contingency has arisen or shall arise, who can say that the action of all branches of the Government should not be prompt, firm, and thorough? Has it happened anywhere during the past year that men have banded together contrary to law, in armed combinations, for unlawful purposes? Has it happened that they are in such numbers and are so strong as to be able forcibly to subvert or defy the State and United States authorities within any State? Has it happened anywhere that the State or local authorities have winked at the misdeeds of these combinations or aided and abetted their outlawry? Has it happened that by reason of these causes the courts of justice cannot convict such criminals and the safety of the people is endangered? Or is there valid reason to believe from what has transpired that these crimes will be committed and the perpetrators go unpunished to such an extent as to require this authority to be placed in the President's hands to secure the public safety? Or, in other words, are we justified by past occurrences in placing this power in the hands of the President?

We have already seen that the armed, organized, lawless, murderous combinations of men in Alabama on election day at various points and previously have utterly destroyed the rights of peaceable citizens, and uprooted all authority; that before them personal safety, personal liberty, property, and life have all perished. At Girard, Spring Hill, Eufaula, Mobile, and other places, on election day human rights were as little regarded as they are among savage tribes, whose only law is brute force, and whose chief delight is the blood of their victims. It was no accident that these armed democrats met by the hundred at divers places both before and on election day and intimidated, scattered, drove away, or wounded or slew their political opponents. It was no accident that these outlaws defied the authorities in some places and were in complicity with them in others. It was no accident that the courts of justice took no cognizance of these multitudinous crimes, and held safety, peace, and human life as mere baubles and playthings for political partisans. It was no accident that in the aggregate thousands of voters in Alabama were kept from the polls by fear and the majority given to the men who surrounded the ballot-boxes by troops of armed ruffians and added to frauds of a glaring nature the violence of barbarians. These dreadful scenes were the result of design, of preparation, of organization, of a far-reaching and sagacious purpose to obtain political mastery.

There is but one authority that can now intervene to save human rights there, and that is the authority of the whole nation. The Army, the United States courts, the Congress, the President, they alone can be respected, they alone can compel order and restore peace.

The question has arisen whether the operation of this section should be general or confined to certain States expressly. It is believed that the terms of the bill furnish in themselves a sufficient limit to the authority of the President, and that a legislative discrimination making the law local in its application is founded on no basis that justifies such an extraordinary course. The facts of rebellion are what at all events ought to determine the suspension of the writ, and can never be mistaken. They must be as apparent and indisputable as the existence of the nation, and no chief executive officer could for one moment manufacture an excuse to mistake them and be sustained by the people. It would be a usurpation as bold and as little calculated for success as the assumption of royal powers and a declaration of hereditary succession to the throne—a usurpation as improbable as a seizure by the President of the public Treasury by armed force and a declaration that the Republic had ceased to exist.

Passing by all these facts, what shall I say of the future if the action in Louisiana and Arkansas is to be repeated in other States? Where will violence, usurpation, despotism, crime, and calamities end if the examples there set are followed? State after State may by the lawless action of public assemblages of the people be carried away, and party spirit will overthrow and trample down whatever there is that is sacred in human institutions. One after another they will go down under the deluge of anarchy and at last the nation itself be swallowed up in the gulf of revolution. If there be no restraint, no system of amendment, no regulation that can bind the restless and ambitious leaders in political strife, then our days as a nation are numbered, and the sun of republican government is sinking already beneath the horizon. The twilight and the swift-following darkness of national death are rapidly approaching.

Such, then, is the condition of these States; and the question arises, what shall be done? Shall they be left to the dissensions, the disorders, the outlawry that now prevail, or shall a remedy be applied? If there was any hope for reformation within and by the States, the whole subject might be left to them. But years of experiment have proven that such a hope is vain. Whatever there is in patient waiting has been exhausted, the people have grown sick and weary to death of these outrages upon their rights. If their government cannot protect them, what resource is left but to begin a course of reprisal upon their enemies, to seek redress or revenge as the savage does, to resort to the weapons which God and nature have put in their hands for the protection of their property and the preservation of their lives? Upon them they must fall back, and upon them alone they must rely, if the General Government will not step in for their defense.

The measure presented forbids nothing that is right, puts no obstacles in the way of the free and proper action of the citizen, infringes in no respect upon his liberties, interferes in no manner with whatever he may have, or claim, or hope as a free American. It protects him, it guarantees his enjoyment of the benefits of his Government, it proposes to shield him from wrong and harm. The polls have been the constant scene of wrongs and crimes which the States in many instances disregard and overlook. They must be stopped, the criminals must be punished, the law must be maintained. Congress has the power to do so, the Constitution contemplates such action, and the emergency has arisen for it. This measure creates offenses and brings them within the jurisdiction of the United States courts, for the reason that that is the only tribunal left for their adjudication; for the reason that the State courts take no recognizance of them.

What dangerous exercise of power is to be found here? Can we not trust the courts of the nation? What is there about Federal jurisdiction that is odious? What lack of legal skill or wisdom is found there? What stain of dishonor or bad faith or treachery attaches there? What lack of fealty to the Constitution resides there? So far our Federal courts have maintained an honorable and proud position in the administration of justice, in splendid contrast with many of the State courts.

No one has just cause to fear our Federal courts but the violators of law, the perpetrators of crime, their aiders and abettors, their sympathizers, those who expect to gain advantages from their villainy and arrogate power by their usurpations and outlawries. Let them be afraid, let them tremble before the stern authority of the nation that commands peace, that forbids wrong, that protects the weak, that establishes justice.

What dangerous power is intrusted to the President? When rebellion overmasters the civil authorities, he is to be authorized to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. When the facts are so obvious, so glaring, so overwhelming in their enormity as to amount to a prostration of civil law, then he is to use the military power to make arrests and hold for trial the persons who have offended. Then, and not till then, is the local court to be denied the power to inquire into the cause of detention, and to release the prisoner at discretion. Of what value is the writ of habeas corpus in Arkansas or Louisiana to the citizen when other more important and vital rights are utterly disregarded and unprotected? Had we better trust the governors of States to preserve peace and order, had we better rely upon the broken reeds that have so signally failed us, than upon that strong arm that never in war or peace has weakened or faltered or trembled under responsibility or in the face of danger? Is it better to trust to the leaders of parties and to rival governors, or to the responsible, unbiased, the cooler head of the National Government? Has the present Executive not shown the most signal forbearance and moderation under the circumstances, going so far as to wring from his bitterest foes, during last summer, their hearty commendation and applause? And only till recently, when further forbearance was impossible, has he by his decided action brought upon his head their unqualified and bitter condemnation. No one but a transgressor need dread him. No party need apprehend his interference unless it proposes by crime to gain supremacy; no State need tremble for its sovereignty that abides by the Constitution and upholds the sacred rights of humanity.

Can we not trust the President in the hour of danger, of disaster, of rebellion, be it great or small, as we have trusted him heretofore? Somebody in great emergencies must be trusted, somebody must be clothed with power, somebody must act, somebody must take the responsibility, or the nation will die. Civil wars do not originate always by a general uprising; they may have small beginnings, and like the fires of disastrous conflagrations, spread and magnify themselves until earth and heaven is wrapped in flames. When the eventful day shall come, the President must put his foot down; he is made for that, and a hundred years of liberty tells us that the Executive of our nation is none the less the representative of its might, because it is the most tremendous that mortal man can wield in a just cause.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose, in the few minutes that I have allotted myself this evening, to discuss the merits of this extraordinary, revolutionary, and anti-republican measure proposed by the majority of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. As a member of that committee, I desire only to satisfy this House and the country that, so far as the result of the investigation made by the committee is concerned, there were no facts developed that justify the harsh and extraordinary measures which are brought to the consideration of this House by that committee.

I should be very glad to believe that there was any motive other than the interests of party at the bottom of the recommendation of our committee. I would be very glad to believe that the great interests of our country were to be consulted, and not the interests of party. But I cannot resist the conviction that what I see this morning in the National Republican, the presidential organ, in this city, is true. I find in a long and labored editorial in that paper of this morning, in speaking of this bill, this remarkable statement in small capitals:

> We repeat here what we have said very often, the passage of the bill is required to preserve to the republican party the electoral vote of the Southern States.

That, I fear, is the motive that operates here with too many to force the passage of this measure in this time of peace. I regret that I have not time to travel over this testimony as it was disclosed before us, but I call the attention of the House, and in reference to this I speak of Alabama alone, that in the instructions under which we went to Alabama to obtain evidence in reference to matters that have been brought to our attention we had but three matters that we had to look into. First, the assassinations, murders, and outrages that had occurred in Alabama at the election and prior thereto in the canvass; second, whether the military had interfered in that election; and lastly, the question of disturbance at the polls. Those were the only questions that were submitted to us. But it will be found upon examination of this testimony that almost every other question than those were brought in evidence before us.

Why, sir, we had to go back to 1870, and I will call your attention to the remarkable testimony of a witness known as Primus Magee to prove a state of facts that had occurred in 1870 at or near a place where the Ku-Klux committee sat, in order to show what? Not that there was any intimidation, or any interference with the election of last year; not that there was any disturbance or outrage, but for the purpose of firing anew the northern heart and fanning the slumbering embers of sectional hate in this country.

Furthermore, I offered evidence to prove that that witness had testified falsely; and that was rejected. I have affidavits to that effect now.

I say, then, that in this large volume of testimony there is evidence bearing upon every conceivable question—ostracism, scalawaggery, carpet-baggery, mismanagement of the public schools, frauds in elections, and various other subjects which if you will refer to the resolution under which the committee was organized will be seen to be entirely beyond the scope of our authority.

But, sir, when we came to examine a question that affected the freedom of election—the question whether there was corruption in the election, whether voters had been influenced by the use of the generous bounty of the Government in giving rations for the overflowed sections of the State, on the Alabama, Black Warrior, and the Tombigbee Rivers—this testimony was excluded; we were not allowed to go into that, upon a specious pretext. But upon that point enough was shown to demonstrate, together with the evidence presented from the War Department, that the generous donation of the Government of the United States to that unfortunate people was used as an agency of corruption in the election. It was sent to places fifty or one hundred miles from any overflow. Before the investigation had proceeded three days it was proved beyond all question that three casks of this meat were used at Opelika for the purpose of giving a grand barbecue to the colored voters congregated there on the day before the election. A gentleman near me asks by whom? I answer by leaders of the republican party. More than that, these provisions were sent to Decatur, one hundred miles from any overflow. There were five counties in the fourth district of Alabama where, although the Army officer sent to look after it says that the meat was not authorized to be sent there, yet he was able to reclaim only a portion of it, which was afterward seized by the officers of the Army because of the unlawful and improper diversion.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] who sits near me says "Not in the fourth district." Yes, sir, it was in the fourth district. I have no time to read from the evidence; but I state what is proved by Executive Document No. 110, that there are five counties in the fourth district which Captain Gentry reports were not entitled to this bacon and yet it was distributed there.

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman makes a mistake.

Mr. BUCKNER. I cannot be mistaken in that point. One of the counties is Autauga; another is Bibb. They as I understand are in the gentleman's district.

Mr. HAYS. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] would not allow himself to be interrupted even for a question. I ask that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] be protected from interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER in the chair.) If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] so desires, the Chair will recognize no other gentleman in his time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I only state the evidence which I obtain from the records here. I refer gentlemen to document 110, accessible to anybody. In this evidence it appears that Captain Gentry, who was sent down there by the War Department to report as to what had become of this meat, reports that five counties of the district represented by the honorable gentleman [Mr. HAYS]—counties that were not entitled to the bacon or any portion of it—did get their share. That is what I state. Whether they are in the gentleman's district or not, they are so set down in this report.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that after we had taken this testimony for three days and proved these facts at Opelika—that the meat was thus improperly used—the investigation upon that point was closed. Why? Because gentlemen said it had been investigated by somebody else—by some other committee. We all know there is no truth in that. It is true that the matter had been referred to the War Department, and it is from the report of the War Department that I get the facts to which I have called the attention of the House. That bacon was subdivided here by an agreement among the republican members of Congress from that State—the gentleman from the fourth district [Mr. HAYS] among the number. It was divided out in proportion to their relative strength. I go further, and say that according to this report, document No. 110, this meat was used during September and October and some of it as late as November. To Demopolis forty-five hogsheads were sent, weighing fifty-three thousand pounds. Here is a statement signed by John W. Dereen, one of the distributors. He says that this meat was given to counties not on the rivers; to counties not entitled to it; to Baker, Bibb, Fayette, Perry, and Shelby—"in accordance with instructions from Hon. CHARLES HAYS."

While the governor of the State was authorized to receive this meat, the republican members from Alabama were, by an agreement among them, to appoint the men who were to distribute it. A portion of it was sent to Decatur, away up on the Tennessee River, one hundred miles off any overflow.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend that these matters were within the purview of our instructions as a committee; but I do say that they were as much within the terms of our authority under the order of the House as the question whether there was any fraud in the election or whether the public schools were taught by blacks or whites, or what proportion of money the blacks got, or hundreds of other questions that were examined into with so much gusto and delight by a majority of the committee, and the evidence upon which constitutes the great bulk of this volume. What did we go there to inquire into? The objects of the investigation are defined in the preamble of the resolution under which the committee were appointed:

> Whereas at the recent election for Representatives to Congress in the State of Alabama, and during the canvass which preceded said election, Federal soldiers were stationed in several counties in said State by order of the President of the United States; and whereas information had been received by the President that intimidation and threats, violence, murder, and assassination had been resorted to in said State for the purpose of preventing electors from voting; and whereas these allegations have been denied by a portion of the press of Alabama and correspondents of northern newspapers; and it has been stated by them that there was no intimidation, or threat, or violence of any kind for the purpose of deterring or influencing voters at such election, and it has been charged by them that said troops were sent to Alabama to intimidate and overawe electors and prevent the free exercise of suffrage by such at said election.

The resolution then goes on and directs us to inquire into the truth of these allegations.

Now what is the evidence on this subject to prove murder and violence? Let me here call attention to what was generally circulated throughout the country prior to the election. This resolution you will recollect was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] who sits by me. It was he who moved for this investigation. The evidence shows that it was through his instrumentality the troops were sent there. The evidence also shows that he claimed credit for sending them there. In his letter he justifies and gives facts and particulars upon which the President and Attorney-General were to be justified for sending troops into Alabama. The House therefore has to look to the allegations that Mr. HAYS made as to the condition of the State of Alabama prior to and at the time the troops were sent there.

Mr. HAYS. I deny that; I never said it.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is correcting what one of the witnesses said. He does not deny the witness said it; and the witness, according to the testimony, is his intimate personal friend and business agent. Whether he said it or not I do not pretend to say; I am only looking at the facts as they appear in the printed volume.

Now, Mr. HAYS wrote to General HAWLEY under date of September 7, 1875. What does he say in that letter after being called upon by Mr. HAWLEY to write a letter justifying the action of the President and Attorney-General in sending troops into Alabama? What does he say? I will read from his letter:

The bare recital of proven facts shall be my only appeal. That will cause the heart to shudder, the cheek to blanch, and the mind to wonder how such dastardly outrages, such unprovoked murders, and such fiend-like conduct can be tolerated for an hour. I shall be particular to narrate no rumors, to color no atrocity, to "set down naught in malice," but simply to give you well-authenticated facts, with dates, names, and localities, so that every man in the land may himself verify the accuracy of my statements, if he deems it necessary. These, then, I proceed to give you, with the deliberate opinion on my part, that the half cannot be told, and that to-day many victims of hellish murder are sleeping in unknown spots and secluded places from which they will never be wakened until the final judgment-day.

He then draws up an indictment against the whole white people of Alabama, with counts one after another, stating where these outrages were committed, by whom they were committed, naming the guilty parties and the circumstances of the different offenses. Any one who is curious and desires to examine the letter of General HAWLEY and the letter which Mr. HAYS wrote in reply will find them on pages 1254 and 1255.

This letter was the operating cause in the formation of this committee. But in the report of the majority of the committee there are only three lines about it. Let me read them:

In this connection, and as an act of justice to a gentleman who has been bitterly denounced, we find that Mr. HAYS had reasonable grounds upon which to base his letter to Mr. HAWLEY at the time it was written, and that in the main the same is substantially corroborated by the testimony.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that there is no corroboration in this testimony for this indictment against the white people of Alabama. There are eight murders charged to have been committed in Sumter county, including Billings and Ivey. There is not a particle of truth there were any political assassinations in that county, not a particle of truth that any negro or white man was killed in that county last year except Billings and Ivey. And I wish to say now, for fear I may not have time to go into it, that while they may have been committed for political reasons, there is not a particle of proof going to show they were so committed except the simple fact that one was a white man and a republican and the other a colored man and a republican. There is not the first particle of testimony besides that simple fact to show there was any political consideration involved in the matter at all. Yet there are eight murders charged to have been committed—eight political assassinations in this county of Sumter.

Let us come to Pickens County. A terrible picture is given of the condition of things there. What is it?

Outrages in this county are the rule; yet from the terrorism existing in that locality only an occasional murder leaks out. I cite two cases. In Carrollton, Pickens County, four colored men, who were supposed to be "emissaries" sent to post the negroes on their rights, were taken the third week in August from their cabins and hung by the road-side. This deed was perpetrated in open daylight by a body of unmasked white men.

On the 20th of August, 1874, the bodies of three men, two colored and one white, were discovered floating down the Tombigbee River, lashed to some logs. When found the bodies were badly decomposed and their personal identity to this day remains undiscovered. The white man had a placard pinned to his neck saying, "This is the way we treat Dutch niggers," evidently alluding to the nativity of the man, who seemed to be a German. The other two were placarded, "To Mobile, with the compliments of Pickens County."

I undertake to say, and I challenge denial, there is not a scintilla of evidence of any such thing, not a word in this testimony. What do we find in Hale County, from which James Bliss, it is charged, was run out. Bliss never was run out of Hale; and he was a member of the convention held at Montgomery.

In Choctaw County it was charged that a company of whites ambushed a party of negroes returning from church, killed ten and wounded thirteen.

Mark you, this occurred prior to the 1st or at least the 15th of August. The convention met on the 20th of August, at Montgomery. These men, Jack Turner and Jack Finley, who were charged with being concerned in these murders, were there, and the evidence shows that they called upon Mr. Hays and told Mr. H. that there was no truth in the story; and yet September 7 he writes this letter to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut.

So it is in Coffee County, where two were killed and six badly wounded. There is not a word of truth in it; that is, so far as evidence before this committee is concerned. It is charged that William A. Lipscomb, a republican, was killed on the public road in Marengo, and the evidence is that that man is living to-day. Mr. Hays was at the meeting of the republican convention where all the leaders of the republican party in the State were, and where this question of disturbances and outrage was canvassed and discussed and referred to a special committee.

By the way, they did not ask the President to interfere. They appointed a committee to request the governor to examine into these things. The President, or the Attorney-General, at the suggestion as is proved here of Mr. WHITE, Mr. HAYS, and Senator SPENCER, without ever consulting the governor, sent the troops there under the miserable pretext that it was necessary to serve the process of the courts. That is the pretext that is used here, that it was necessary not to preserve the peace, but to serve the process of the courts. Nor is there any proof before this committee but what a posse could have been had at any time from the people of Alabama in order to serve the process of the United States courts.

Now I say beyond all sort of controversy that with the exception of the burning of two school-houses away off in the eastern portion of the State and the murder of Billings and Ivey, up to the time that this letter was written Alabama was as peaceful a State as any State in this Union so far as outrages and violence are concerned. I say that the evidence proves that, and it cannot be contradicted. There were disturbances there as well as elsewhere. There were fights and disturbances among the negroes, and a great many of them, in various localities. But I say the only case on which you can predicate that they grew out of political considerations was the case of Billings and Ivey.

Mr. BROMBERG. You say it cannot be contradicted. You mean to say that it cannot be truthfully contradicted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I mean to say that the evidence went to show the contrary. That is what I mean to say.

I do not mean to go further into the testimony. But let me say that these facts here introduced, which were the cause for and the justification of the conduct of the President and Attorney-General and form the foundation of this indictment of Mr. HAYS against his own people, nine out of ten of them have their locality in his own immediate neighborhood, in his own district nearly; and I say if he had desired to find out whether they really occurred or not he had the opportunity. He was there up to about the 20th or 22d of August, when he came on to Washington for the purpose of getting troops sent to the State, and this letter is written here at Washington after the President or after the Attorney-General had, on the 3d of September, ordered the troops to go South to take care of Alabama and in effect to carry the elections for the republicans.

But, Mr. Speaker, I agreed to divide a portion of my time with some gentlemen here. As I said before, I only occupy any portion of my time for the purpose of disabusing the minds of members of this House of the idea that there was anything in the condition of Alabama to justify this harsh and extraordinary legislation which is proposed by our committee. It never was discussed in that committee, and I say that the object of this is not the benefit of the country, is not to give quiet to the South, but it is to draw the colored line more thoroughly, to antagonize the two races in hostile ranks forever, and to consign that region which ought to be one of the most happy and prosperous sections of the country to race conflicts and to eternal animosity. That will be the effect of all such legislation as this.

There are many other points to which I might have adverted, especially on this question of riots at the polls. I will make just one single observation in reference to those riots. It is a miracle, Mr. Speaker, that there were not more riots and more frauds in the election. There is no law in Alabama which provides for an honest ballot—no law whatever. There is no law, that amounts to anything, to prevent false registration; for there is no connection between the registration and the ballot-box. And the act of the Alabama Legislature, the republican Legislature, according to the testimony of Mr. BROMBERG, opened the door to fraud upon the ballot knowingly and willfully. It enabled the large black counties, the counties of the black belt, to mass their voters together by the thousand, as they did under the authority and direction of their leaders, and to repeat, to double vote as often as they pleased, and when a man was caught in the act of repeating, if he were taken up and brought before a justice of the peace or other judicial officer, he could be discharged on his simple recognizance; and that is the last of the offender and the offense. The wonder is that there was not five times as much fraud and that there was not three times as much crime as there was on the day of the election.

I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How long does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKNER. For twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CASON.]

Mr. CASON. I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted. (See Appendix.)

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is not so much with a view to discuss the details of the bill now before the House that I have at this time sought the floor, as it is to deprecate any and all legislative action which shall result in still further inflaming the public mind. It is my wish to record a protest against any policy which does not tend to restrain the present irritation by which the whole country with its priceless institutions is made the prey of opposing extremists and the helpless victim of contending partisans. In this hour of jarring opinion and political bitterness, when too many seem ready to renew the disastrous conflicts of the past and to again let loose the waters of turbulence and hate, I would if possible speak a word in the interest of peace and conciliation, and of allaying, so far as the limited measure of my influence may serve, the spirit of disturbance and discord already prevalent not alone in this Capitol but in various portions of the Republic. So far as my feeble efforts may avail, I would counsel and earnestly insist that the present destructive and ruinous contentions of partisanship might be immediately and altogether displaced by policies and exertions prompted by the broadest and most unselfish statesmanship. Could my voice reach not merely through the spaces and recesses of this Hall, but to the remotest community where poli-tical strife engenders public apprehension and endangers the public safety, I would invoke the utmost prudence and moderation and the adoption of wiser and more fraternal methods of policy by each of the two great parties which now seek the one to keep and the other to obtain the political supremacy of the nation.

Within less than two months the first decade since the war will have reached its close. During that time the formerly hostile sections of the Republic have made mutual professions of pacific sentiments. They have announced to each other and before the world that they were associated in perfectly pacific relations; and yet after all these professions of mutual fealty to a common Constitution which has broadened its guarantees of liberty and citizenship so as to comprehend men of every race, after all these pledges of union and concord, given under the most solemn and binding obligations that can hold mankind together in political society, after all this impartial extension of the sanctions and guarantees of equality and freedom, what are we forced to behold? We find cities and States influenced with the frenzy of partisan discord and ready upon the least provocation to burst out into the blaze of armed hostility; while other cities and other States partake of the excitement and enlist with divided sympathies in behalf of one or the other of the contending factions, thus keeping the entire country in a feverish condition equally injurious to its business prosperity and its political welfare, undermining the faith of the citizen in the stability of our institutions and destroying the very foundations upon which the hopes of liberty, either individual or national, must finally rest.

THE EVILS OF PARTY.

The two political organizations which respectively attract and aggregate the mass of electors throughout the land, under the inspiration of party feeling and the natural and almost inevitable pressure of extreme opinion to which they are subject, are flung against each other at every election with repeated shocks of violence, and are kept in constant collision chiefly for the purpose of distributing the offices of the country to their respective adherents or of promoting other personal schemes either political or financial. In the Southern States this evil is greatly aggravated by the fact that the two parties are separated by the discrimination of race, thereby adding to the rancor of the struggle for patronage and preferment the still more bitter strife that comes from arraying men against each other on the line of color; a line, too, which in this instance generally marks the distinction between capital and labor, between those who possess the greater share of the wealth and intelligence of the community and those who, however desirable it may be that they should soon acquire these qualifications, are nevertheless in great measure without them.

To the ordinary mischief arising from a partisan contest for office and the extraordinary mischief of having this contest involve the prejudice of race we must still add a third mischief, which is that every onset between the parties is apt to be marked with sharp crimination and recrimination in regard to events of the past, with the bandying of taunts and accusations which serve to revive and perpetuate resentments which our common interest and the interest of posterity require us as soon as possible to bury. For while we may gratefully cherish the memory of that patriotism which saved the Union for the sake of liberty and may honor the martyrs who died for the national preservation, yet no truth is more evident than that the general welfare imperatively demands that in this Hall, in the deliberations of the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, and in every portion of the broad domain embraced under a Constitution conferring equality of rights to each and every State as well as equality of civil and political privileges to each and every individual, every enmity, every hostile thought, and every unfriendly memory associated with the war should be placed at once and forever in the tomb of everlasting forgetfulness, beyond every effort or even attempt at resurrection.

SAD RESULT OF THESE EVILS.

In the clash and collision incident to the efforts of these parties to secure the supremacy and to control the offices, both State and national, great communities are made to suffer, to have their business prostrated, their laws overborne by violent dissension, their resources squandered, their taxes swelled to an extent that renders property well-nigh valueless, and their people arrayed against each other with an acerbity of feeling which unless allayed will spread like a plague-spot and extend its deadly influence to communities now quiet and peaceable. Who shall deny therefore, in this condition of our affairs that the most pressing demand of our statesmanship is not menace but mediation? Who that rises above party and takes his stand upon the elevated ground of true patriotism does not see that the remedy for the evils here noted is not to be sought in measures that intensify the spirit of alienation, but in measures that deepen and broaden the affection of all citizens for each other and for the government under which they live.

THE STRIFE SHOULD CEASE.

Indeed, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there has never been a time in our history when there has been so great a requirement, and I may add so great an opportunity, for an interposition to put an end to a causeless strife as at this moment. In calling this strife causeless I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not speak of the incidents and consequences of the agitation, but of the real facts that originally justify it. There is really nothing to warrant the conflict now waging and apparently assuming a more threatening aspect by the very disturbance to which it gives rise. A year ago the nation was comparatively undisturbed by these questions growing out of the work of reconstruction. Congress divided upon measures relating to finance and the development of plans for promoting the material welfare of the entire people. Party lines were apparently obliterated in the attempted settlement of the leading questions of public policy. But now from the conjunction of sundry political puzzles presented by the partisan maneuvers in two of the Southwestern States of the Union, by the utterly reprehensible conduct of certain unlawful combinations in these and other neighboring States, and still more perhaps by the anxiety naturally excited by the preparation for the presidential contest of 1876, there is a state of alarm which a twelvemonth since no man would have dared to predict or even suspect. To successfully repress and stay this tide of popular agitation is to confer a boon in which the forty millions of American people, whether white or black, whether native or foreign born, shall derive an immeasurable benefit. Had we a Washington to counsel harmony and to hush the rising tempest by saying to the winds and waves of conflicting opinions, "Peace, be still;" had we a Clay to sound the trumpet of pacification, and thus awaken an enthusiastic response and glad acclaim throughout the nation; had we a Lincoln to proclaim with patriotic inspiration and with a great and gentle spirit, "Charity to all and malice toward none," we should have in one like these the statesman which the crisis requires, one who would meet the real aspirations of the great body of the people North and South, East and West, and be recognized as the nation's benefactor and the champion of its highest interests.

OPPOSITION TO FURTHER COERCIVE LEGISLATION.

Indulging this view, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the policy of conciliation, I need scarcely add that I am opposed to the measures embraced in the various political bills and resolutions recently reported, which imply a further extension and more rigid enforcement of Federal power in the South. This series of measures involve, among other purposes, the interference of the Federal authority in sundry ways in a sphere of legislation hitherto left to the several States; in conferring upon the President the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in subverting the present State government of Arkansas, and in authorizing the maintenance against the popular will of the present fraudulent government of Louisiana by the military force of the nation. Let me briefly state the reasons of my opposition to all legislation of this character.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTION.

In the first place, I object to all these measures because they are in the main based upon inferential and not upon the clearly expressed sanctions of the Constitution. The arguments which justify this conclusion have been and will be fully presented by other gentlemen of the House who confine themselves to that branch of the discussion, but I cannot refrain from insisting that arguments of this nature should receive the most serious and careful attention. If the nation's safety is the supreme law, that law consists in the unequivocal recognition of the absolute supremacy of the Constitution. Our escape alike from anarchy and despotism depends upon the maintenance of this doctrine. Never to any people on the face of the earth has the old Roman maxim that "all must be slaves of the law if all would be free" come with greater emphasis. Our government neither owns nor imposes upon any human being any master but the law; and in taking our seats, Mr. Speaker, as members of this House, no oath was registered by us in heaven to bow to any dictation save that imposed by the Constitution of the United States. Unswerving loyalty to this instrument is the exclusive motto inscribed upon the escutcheon of the national legislator. Scrupulous fidelity to this trust is just now of intensified obligation from the comparative relaxation of its sanctions in our recent history. The war, which resulted in the extension of the guarantees of personal freedom by the additional amendments to the Constitution, tended at the same time to impair its hold upon the popular reverence. It was subjected to a severe strain in the great contest by which its avowed supporters were sometimes forced to a doubtful construction of its meaning, and even to place themselves on the wrong side of the doubt by the nation's imperative necessity; while those, on the other hand, who by the force of arms sought a release from its authority could scarcely fail to come out of the conflict with a diminished veneration for that which they had fought for four years to destroy. To rehabilitate and accustom the entire nation to the sole use of constitutional methods; to reduce rather than to enlarge the redundancy and overflow of national legislation, and to cause it to again run in clearly defined constitutional channels; to strengthen and amplify the means and agencies for keeping both government and people within the limits of constitutional law—this is the highest work, and, I might add, is the fundamental condition of patriotism. To those who would warp the Constitution to meet a temporary expedient for the protection of personal liberty I would say beware how you touch the shrine in which is deposited the only security of freedom to every citizen. In the rash and desperate effort to do even a seeming good, by a resort to measures which may establish unconstitutional precedents, do not demolish the very sanctuary of American liberty and leave us all to the mercy of faction or the fickle whim of power.

THE CONSTITUTION SHOULD BE PRESERVED FOR THE EMANCIPATED RACE.

To every class of persons a jealous regard for the constitutional limits of Federal power is a matter of deep concern; but to none so much as to those who have no other security. The weak and defenseless are they who most need the safeguards of the Constitution. The black man is in the minority. He is comparatively lacking in wealth and education. Upon him rests the traditional burden of a previous inferior condition. For him the Constitution, especially by its last three amendments, has been made a bulwark and extends over him the broad shield of its protection. To him, therefore, the least infraction of the instrument or the least deviation from the strict letter of its provisions is a proceeding of immense moment, since its preservation is his only sure defense against the prejudice and encroachments of the more fortunate race. Any measure of national legislation, any act of executive interference which obtrudes beyond that sacred boundary of power delegated to the General Government and invades the rights reserved to the States or the individual, is one which the colored man of all others in this nation should be the last to invoke and the first to resist by every lawful means at his command. For the black man the Constitution spans the heavens as the bow of grand promise and of sublime hope. It is his safety for the present and his encouragement for the future. He should religiously remonstrate against every act of Federal power which shall tend to dissipate that guarantee of his welfare, that only security of his continued liberty. With him, cursed should be the hand which under any pretext profanes the ark which bears the sole human covenant of his freedom and equal citizenship. Indeed, so far as all are concerned, if we would preserve the jewel of impartial liberty that sparkles in the coronet of the Republic, we must prevent the least infraction of the setting in which it is retained.

NO EXTENSION OF MILITARY RULE.

The policy proposed in these measures is also liable to the objection that it encourages further military interference by the General Government and implies in certain localities the prolonged subjection of the civil to the military power. This neither accords with the spirit of our institutions nor with the prevailing sentiment of the people. The termination of the period of the silence of the laws under arms in any section has been anxiously awaited. "Cedant arma togæ"—let the bayonet yield to the ermine—is the popular aspiration as well as the essential condition of national safety. No race has clung to this principle through so long and severe struggles, or has come to the inheritance of its fruits by such immense sacrifices, as our own; and the price of ten centuries of Anglo-Saxon exertion and endurance is not to be heedlessly thrown away by acts of impolicy which some are so ready to urge. History, both English and American, has given its lessons in vain if it has not taught us that we can have no supremacy of law so long as the law is not left to its normal and constitutional methods of enforcement. Courts and juries furnish the methods by which justice is secured, and to suppress these by external force is to palsy the very arm of the law and to make it more and more powerless for the security of right. The law is ever jealous of its prerogative. It endures no rival and shuns companionship with every other form of jurisdiction. To be efficient it must be trusted. For this reason the Constitution throws every possible guard around its administration, and only permits its interruption under the two circumstances of rebellion and invasion. Such interruption is a last resort, being justified by an actual and not an anticipated necessity. Nothing can be more clear than that extraordinary provisions for the permission of executive power to suppress a prospective rebellion would inevitably inflame the communities suspected and invite them to further discontent and even open hostility. The Constitution evidently contemplates the use of such a measure as a remedy for an actually existing rebellion, not as a precaution against an imaginary one. Therefore to clothe the President with the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at his discretion is to assume that the nation is already convulsed with internal revolution or that an armed foreign foe is threatening its borders. That either of these contingencies exists no man will pretend.

NO SECTIONAL LEGISLATION.

Again, the measures embraced in this policy are to be disapproved, because they are intended for application to only one section of the country and propose an interposition of Federal authority in the South, which would not find endurance in the North. The Federal interference in elections; the filling the land with marshals and deputy marshals; the superseding of State authority to suppress and punish conspiracy and treason against itself; the multiplication of machinery for affording pretexts for displacing the local authorities by the National Government, are provisions which the people of my State do not want for themselves so long as their necessity can be avoided. They are not longing for the day to be hastened when soldiers shall be their reliance for peace and order and then United States officials shall constitute their police; and what they do not want for themselves, they do not wish to force upon others. They desire no unequal legislation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it is possible, under the Constitution, to frame a Federal law that shall not apply alike to all the States. The tenth amendment declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." The rights reserved to the States are reserved equally to each and every State. Each of the thirty-seven Commonwealths in this Union, so far as regards the possession of these rights, stands upon the footing of perfect equality with each of the others. Under the Constitution there can be no interference in the internal administration of a State which would not in similar circumstances be justified in Massachusetts as well as Arkansas. There can be no United States statute to which Michigan shall not be subject as well as Louisiana. Laws of intentional local application, imposed for partial and sectional enforcement, are impolitic and unjust, and can find no support either from statesmanship or patriotism.

HOME RULE SHOULD BE ESPECIALLY ENCOURAGED IN THE SOUTH.

There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, which should have due importance in the consideration of this question, and that is the wide departure implied in this whole policy from the theory and practice of local self-government. In this departure there is the greater evil, because of all sections of the Union, the South most imperatively requires the encouragement of the principle of home rule. We hear much said of imperialism, but with all deference to the State-rights sentiment so stoutly and conspicuously advocated in the South, let me say that if ever imperialism shall become a cherished idea and a practical result in this country, that idea and that result will find their first and readiest welcome, not in the Northern or the Western, but in the Southern States. The dangers of a movement for an empire lie on the lower side of the parallel of latitude that traverses this Capitol. There is a cause for such an apprehension from a defective feature in the constitution of southern political society which has no existence in the North and West, and which contributes to create in that section a centralizing tendency. For, according to my view, sir, the real unit of every free and truly republican political organization is the municipality. The attainment or the want of this, as also the perfection of its development, are conditions which determine the nature of the entire political fabric. The possession of a well organized municipal system affords that kind of home or local government which serves as the indispensable basis of republican liberty. In no portion of the globe is this system for the administration of those political affairs which have the most intimate concern with personal rights and the public interest so thoroughly established and so completely furnished for its designed service as in the New England States, where it originated, and in that belt of States which in this regard copied the New England example. In all the northern portions of the Union the republican form of government can no more be shaken from its foundation than the everlasting hills can be swept from their granite base. The doctrine of home rule, that kind of rule which for the most part settles disputes, quiets disturbances, distributes justice between man and man by agencies created by the people right at home in their own township, is imbedded in the popular heart and forms the essential feature of their political compact. Here imperialism has no encouragement and receives no sympathy. Society must be torn from the root out of which it springs; it must even be reorganized by a change of its constituent elements, before that spirit of centralization which tends toward an empire could become prevalent among the people.

But imperialism, let me tell gentlemen, if it shall ever overspread this country, if it shall rise like a dark cloud and overwhelm our political sky, will come from the South. There the strife of race if permitted to go on, the habit of the emancipated portion of the population to rely upon external aid, the impulsiveness even of Saxon blood under a warmer sun, and, more than all, the lack of a perfect municipal system fully enshrined in the popular heart and directing the popular will—these things may well suggest to statesmen of the South the fear of an empire, since in their own midst they see its causes and realize its perils. In that section of the Union home rule is not so much a possession as a want. It is enhanced in its worth and importance for the very reason that it is a matter of greater need. By every means, then, in our power, by every incentive we can offer, by every support and encouragement we can hold forth, in our action here or elsewhere, should the principles and habits of home government, of local self-government, be fostered in the South. By this means we of the North not alone give aid and sympathy in a great undertaking for others' advantage, but avert from ourselves a common danger.

Popular opinion in this country is generally correct opinion, and it justly condemns the misgovernment that appeals to external force for its support. The example of Louisiana has not increased the public confidence in the benefits to be derived from outside interference. And, sir, when I recall the terrible condition of that State, I do not forget that the first European occupation of Michigan and Louisiana was, in each instance, due to that remarkable spirit of enterprise which animated the French people under the illustrious reign of Louis XIV. The first years of the last century witnessed the founding of Detroit and New Orleans, each the respective commercial metropolis of its State, and each settled by the same buoyant and enterprising people. The prosperity of the leading city which stands as one of the gateways of the commerce of the Northwest is in striking contrast with the misgovernment and adversity of the civic community which sprang into existence from the same origin and almost at the same time near the mouth of the Mississippi; and I am sure I speak the sentiments of the people of Detroit and the people of Michigan when I say that they are anxious that the people, of their once sister colony in the far southwest should be speedily made the participants in the same high privileges and blessings which they, themselves, enjoy under the self-imposed restraints of constitutional government.

THE LEGISLATION REQUIRED.

The policy, Mr. Speaker, of further coercive Federal legislation for the South is also wanting in the wisdom of practical statesmanship, because it is not alone destructive of the material prosperity of that section, but tends to the continued stagnation of business and the depression of industrial and commercial activity throughout the entire country. If there be any duty which the citizens of this great Republic owe to each other, surely that is to be ranked as such which binds them under the obligation of an endeavor to secure a common and diffusive prosperity. The Union was formed, among other reasons declared in the preamble to the Constitution, "to promote the common welfare." One of the high purposes of our national existence is displayed in the opportunity which it secures for an efficient co-operation in measures for developing and advancing its material interests. The application of our energies to this purpose has a twofold advantage; it secures an object of high importance in itself, and what is of far greater value, it withdraws attention from those issues which the nation should immediately lay aside. In the presentation of a new and attractive object the petulant child will often forget its testy peevishness; and it is well worth our consideration whether in like manner the nation should not be led to forsake its bickerings by these common efforts for a development of our mighty national resources, and in thus conferring permanent and substantial benefits upon a united people, benefits which shall obliterate sectional feeling as well in their procurement as in their enjoyment.

Closely allied with this question of the revival of business prosperity is the undeniable maxim that no community can prosper where capital and labor are kept at variance and are made the mutual victims of a ruinous antagonism. They should be reconciled; and the partisan policy which foments and keeps alive a constant discord between them in the Southern States is as senseless as it is fatal to the revival of business prosperity. At the present time, when all the industries of the nation are paralyzed; when the spindles in our factories are silent; when the busy hum of our varied machinery has ceased, and that cessation has thrown our artisans out of employment; when those of our citizens suspended from their toil in the mines, in the workshop, in the field, or at the desk, and now rendered destitute by enforced idleness, are to be counted by myriads—when such is the condition of the people all over the land, it seems certainly to be no time for superfluous agitation or for the needless increase of difficulties which fasten a weightier burden upon an already suffering population. Let us address ourselves to the work of creating that spirit of unity and concord and of giving that impulse to business activity and enterprise which will go far toward the restoration of the bright augury of that financial prosperity which is alike our aspiration and our rightful claim. Sir, I do not speak without due reflection nor without the amplest evidence of the truth of my assertion when I say that the great body of the practical business men of this nation, in the North as well as in the South, demand an immediate cessation of these intestine troubles. They realize what we in this Hall ought to appreciate, that an increase of 25 per cent would be made to the business of nearly every northern or western city, and 50 per cent. to the production of every southern community, were there to-day a complete restoration of perfect confidence in the permanent stability of our internal affairs and a complete quiet of all that sectional alarm for which political agitation is chiefly responsible.

CONCLUSION.

Sir, I have frankly expressed my views in regard to the policy of which the bill before us forms an important part; for I believe that true political wisdom points to the adoption of a different course, and I shall record my vote on this and other measures in accordance with the conviction that by the cultivation of concord, by strict allegiance to the Constitution, by intrusting the cure of abuses to the exclusive remedies of law, by the further restriction instead of the extension of military power, by equal and impartial Federal legislation, by the encouragement of home rule where its development is most required, by directing the national energies to an improvement of the industrial condition of the whole people, we of this Congress shall most wisely discharge our duty and most faithfully represent the will of our constituents.

During the remarks of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont,

Mr. BUCKNER said: I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] fifteen minutes.

Mr. SENER. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan to conclude his speech.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the bill now before the House, and I regret to thrust myself so uninvitingly upon their attention at this time. My reasons briefly are these: I oppose the first and second sections of this bill, as I recollect them, because I do not conceive that either by warrant of the Constitution or because of anything that has happened there is either any legal or moral requirement that we should pass any such legislation. It is within the power of the Executive of this nation, whenever there is a contest, to say what is the legally constituted government in any State; and when once that has been decided the decision of the Executive has always been, within the period of the last ten years, acquiesced in by the people of the South.

A MEMBER. How about Louisiana?

Mr. SENER. That is exactly what occurred in the case of Louisiana, to which my attention is called right here. Within the last six months an attempt was made to upset and overturn the Kellogg government; and although this revolution was apparently a peaceable one, as soon as the President of the United States issued his proclamation Kellogg went back into the gubernatorial office and is there to this day.

In the case of Arkansas there was a contention as to whether Brooks or Baxter was de facto and de jure the governor; the President had only to say who was the legal governor, and his proclamation was instantly obeyed.

Now, I oppose the thirteenth section of the bill for this reason: It is here in this land of freedom an attempt in a time of profound peace to set aside the grand writ of habeas corpus which for six centuries in England has been constantly growing more and more sacred to that people, and there this writ of right has received such sanction and approbation, it is so strong to-day that neither king nor Parliament dare to trifle with it. And in our own land, be it remembered, it stands as one of the strongest safeguards in this written Constitution of American rights for the protection of American liberty. Now, so strongly is the love of it ingrained into the affections of our people, and with such devotion do they cling to it, that the State of Massachusetts has within its constitution, if I mistake not, a provision which declares that it shall never be suspended for more than twelve months at a time; and the State of New Hampshire has a provision in its constitution that it shall never be suspended for longer than three months.

In the time of the treasonable schemes of Aaron Burr against the authority of the United States, the then President of the United States, Mr. Jefferson, sent a message to Congress asking it to pass a law authorizing him to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. The Senate in hot haste passed a bill to that effect and sent it over to the House. But although at that time it was supposed the Government was menaced, the House on a motion rejected the bill by yeas 127 while the nays were but 3. And a motion to reject is regarded as an indignity to the other House.

The war of 1812 came, but no suspension of the writ of habeas corpus occurred. Though foreign foes were upon our soil and the guns of foreign armies were thundering against the Capitol, the writ of habeas corpus was not suspended. And shall Congress now in a time of peace, upon a condition of things not in existence but yet to occur, declare a state of facts that shall constitute a rebellion? There are but two contingencies in which the writ of habeas corpus can ever be constitutionally suspended; in the case of rebellion and in the case of invasion. Invasion means foreign war, and rebellion means civil war; and I deny that there is any civil war in the South or that there is any likelihood of such a calamity. Every State of the South is represented on this floor. Every one of them has its full complement of State and municipal offices, duly filled and exercising all the attributes of official life. The courts, State and Federal, are alike open, and misdemeanors and crimes may be tried and punished.

Not until two years of the war of the great rebellion (as it was called) had been waged did Congress pass an act declaring that the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended. It is true President Lincoln acted upon that idea two years before, as did General Jackson in the war of 1812. Once during the war of 1812 General Jackson took the responsibility of suspending the writ of habeas corpus and he was fined for doing so, and many years after, in 1842, Congress, not as a matter of right but as a matter of grace and favor, refunded the money with interest that he paid as a fine.

What is the condition and state of facts put forward before the country to justify this character of legislation? It is gravely alleged that the people of the South cannot be trusted at the ballot-box. Yet that is stated in the face of the fact that upon the floor of this House to-day there sit forty-three republicans from constituencies in the Southern States. It is said there was a change last fall. Yes, there was a change all over the country. If there was a change in the South, so there was in the North; if there was a change in one State there was in all. But is there a man north of the Potomac who believes that there is a necessity for the suspension of the writs of habeas corpus in his section?

It is said there are proscription and intolerance in the South. To some extent that is so. But are you going to punish States and indict a whole people because some are intolerant? Do you suppose legislation can reach them? When Grant proclaimed amnesty at Appomattox, and followed it out through the years of his generalship and the first years of his term as President, peace came, republican successes came. Suddenly there was a turn in the tide. I do not say it was due to the acts of the President. I believe he has made a good President. Unfortunately, however, all the officers in the South are not good men.

It is said that the Federal courts are closed in some of the States of the South. If so, it is for want of judges. There is no Federal judge in Alabama. There was one there, but he was so corrupt he was forced out of office, by resignation, to escape impeachment. There is no court in New Orleans, because the Federal judge there was so corrupt that your Committee on the Judiciary brought into this House articles of impeachment against him. There was another judge in Arkansas, but he was likewise so corrupt that one committee of this House recommended the abolition of his district, and another committee was ready to recommend his impeachment. These things have something to do with the condition of affairs in the South. And because these things are true, they ought to be weighed along with and against the intolerance of disposition manifested in the South.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it would be a pleasant thing to be able to say that the war had left no bitter fruits behind it; that the situation produced by it was accepted in good faith in every section of the country, and that there was no necessity for any further legislation to carry out and make effective the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution and the fundamental conditions upon which the rebel States were rehabilitated with State sovereignty and allowed representation in the Congress of the United States. But to say or think that all is well in the South would be to shut out truth from observation and to stultify yourself to the current history of the day. It is idle to ignore facts. From whatever standpoint you look at the situation you find that society is disturbed and that life and property are insecure. The democrats say that all this is caused by republican misrule, and on the other hand the republicans charge that it is attributable to the fact that democrats resist the execution of United States laws and attempt to nullify the constitutional amendments and the laws which have been enacted to enforce them. Upon this point, then, there is no dispute, that many of the Southern States are in a disordered and revolutionary condition, that business and enterprise are paralyzed, and that the value of property is daily depreciating and life becoming more insecure.

The immediate and direct cause for all this may justly be attributed to the fact that the negro has been enfranchised. If he were disfranchised and not a prize at the ballot-box, order and quiet would reign in Warsaw, or if he would follow the domination of his whilom master and owner and vote with him there would be no trouble; but because he seeks to assert his manhood at the ballot-box and insists upon a recognition of his political rights he is persecuted, maltreated, and outraged, and violence and bloodshed prevail. Deprive the negro of suffrage—make him a serf—and you settle the question in one way and to the satisfaction of the democratic party and white-leaguers. Because the negro is free and a citizen, the hatreds that the war engendered are kept alive and burning in the South to an extent that is fearful and almost incredible, while in the North they are pretty much forgotten except as they are reflected from the South. However much men may deny or disguise it, the color line in the South is drawn and kept up by the white democrats—certainly not by the negroes; and the white man who allies himself with the republican party is counted vile and disreputable. The tendency therefore is to drive white republicans either out of the South or away from their party, and thus practically deprive the negroes of leaders and thereby make them powerless and unable to cope with their political adversaries. The negroes are republicans, and it would be a surprise if they were not. They are grateful to the republican party for freeing and enfranchising them, and they feel that they cannot better pay this debt than by voting with the great party that freed them. Whether this is right or not, does not change the fact; it is so, and everybody understands it; but this very circumstance has operated unfavorably against the negro in the enjoyment of his political rights and affected him unjustly in many other respects. The great mass of the whites of the South are democrats and hate the republican party bitterly and intensely, and especially the negro because they cannot control him politically.

For the purpose of showing this matter more clearly I introduce here and elsewhere testimony taken before the Alabama Committee.

Robert Reed, a colored member of the Alabama Legislature, testifies as follows:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. Is it safe for you to live in Sumter County and express the political sentiments which you have?

Answer. No, sir; it is not safe for me to go back there. They say they will kill me if I ever come back.

Q. And the only crime that they bring against you is that you are a republican?

A. Yes, sir. The very worst democrats will tell you that is all they have against me. Men have come and told me that there is not a white man in the State that can beat me farming, and if I kept out of politics I would be the richest man in the country. Every two years, ever since 1868, they have robbed me from $500 up to a thousand or two thousand, as the election comes along. My wife died about four months ago. I have three children.

Q. Where are your children?

A. They are there. I am going back to see about them. If they kill me I would just as soon die there, as for my children to be down there and me up here.

* * * * * * *

Q. It has been represented that leading colored republicans have been visited at night in their houses, and from fear and threats that were made they went to the woods and laid out there for weeks sometimes.

A. That is all so, sir. While they were looking for me they came across several colored men in the woods, with guns. They had left their homes from fear of violence. They were arrested and carried to Belmont, and certain men told Mr. Hester to take them out and kill them. Nelson Doyle also saw the men killing Mr. Billings.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How long has this intimidation and terrorism, of which you speak, existed in Sumter County or in Alabama?

A. Ever since 1868. Instead of getting better, it gets worse every year.

Q. What acts of violence, if any, are committed toward white republicans?

A. White republicans are treated in the same way. Old Judge Abrahams, of Livingston, has to lay in his house and keep well armed. Mr. Billy Wayne is the same way.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. If those colored people were let alone in that section of the country would they prosper and have comfortable and secure homes?

A. They would.

Q. And make good citizens?

A. Yes, sir. No man can go back upon their record there; but if the Government will not give them some protection they are bound to emigrate and go to some other country.

ROBERT WHITTAKER, (colored,) called by the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?

Answer. My name is Robert Whittaker. I am twenty-seven years old. I live in Montgomery.

Q. As a general thing do not the democrats treat you and your people very well in this country?

A. In 1871 I was a drayman—a public carrier—of this town, and owned a great many stock. I had sixteen mules of my own, and ran eight drays. I did business for a great many of the largest merchants in the place. At that time I did not take an active part in politics, and I went to the polls, voted, and went about my business. In the fall of 1871 I made political speeches around town for the municipal election. They took my patronage away from me, and warned all the merchants in town not to give me anything to do, and did everything to break up my business, and did finally break it up, and to-day would not give me a nickel's worth of work if I was perishing.

Q. You say that in consequence of the notices which were put into the papers, giving the number of your drays, &c., you lost the patronage of the democratic merchants here, and that your business is broken up?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What has become of your business? What have you done with your drays and mules?

A. They have all come to naught.

Q. Has it compelled you to submit to pecuniary loss and sacrifice?

A. Yes, sir; I tried to keep up my business and spent all the cash I had on hand trying to keep it up, but they finally broke me down and boasted of it, saying that they intended to break me down.

Q. Have you any of the papers that contained the notices of the number of your drays, &c.?

A. No, sir; but I have witnesses that such notices were given.

EDGAR R. KELLOGG, captain Nineteenth Infantry, United States Army.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Question. State whether, in your opinion, a great d eal of this bitterness that you speak of—that the democrats have as against the republicans—has not been owing to the character of officials that the Government has placed here, in so far as the United States Government is concerned.

Answer. I think that in many cases a part of the hostility is to be attributed to that. I think that the most of it is to be attributed simply and only to hatred of the Government and everything that pertains to it, and every man who supports it—hatred, and nothing else.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Hatred upon the part of whom?

A. The men who sought to overthrow the Government, in my opinion, would do it again if they had an opportunity; but they never will have it, I think.

Whatever may be said of the negro in other respects, in his politics he is not only honest but a hero; he votes according to his convictions. The pressure to vote the democratic ticket for reasons of gain, pecuniary profit, and immediate personal improvement and advantage, is much stronger than to vote the republican ticket. More democrats make promises of reward to negroes for their votes than republicans, and certainly more threaten to intimidate.

Testimony of G. R. WILLIAMS.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name and residence.

Answer. My name is G. R. Williams. I reside in Huntsville, Alabama.

Q. Were you in Alabama during the last political campaign and election?

A. I was in Madison County and in Limestone County.

Q. State whether the election was entirely peaceable or whether there were any acts of violence or intimidation.

A. The election was not peaceable.

Q. In what regard was it not peaceable?

A. The white-leaguers were there armed and drilling at night and interfering with colored men, making threats to them, and telling them that if they voted the republican ticket they could not stay on their land; numbers of them were driven from their plantations because they had voted the republican ticket.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you know of any one who was prevented from voting?

A. Yes, sir. Colored men were coming to the polls to vote at Maysville from Mr. Gurley's place and from other places around there. When they reached Maysville the polls were opened, and the white men asked them what tickets they were going to vote; they said they were going to vote the republican ticket, and the white men told them they could not vote there. They said, "No niggers can vote the republican ticket in this place. Death or life if you vote that ticket or the other." They commenced fighting there on the day of the election; the men were driven from the polls, and the train was kept back to keep them from coming to Huntsville.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. You were there at Maysville, were you?

A. I was not at Maysville. I was in Huntsville when the party came to town. The colored men walked eighteen miles, and some of them wore their shoes out in going to Huntsville to vote. Some of them voted in Huntsville, and the democrats took some and put them in jail, saying that they had voted twice, both at Maysville and there. The colored men denied that, and some were driven from the polls and some others were shot at. Nick Gurley was shot so badly that they had to carry him home. Henry Moore, a colored man, went to some white men and told them they would have to have peace that day; that the colored men had all come there to vote the republican ticket of their own free will, and if peace was not had, bad times would occur. A great many colored men had to leave without voting.

* * * * * * *

Q. You didn't hear of any of them being kept from voting except at this place?
A. Men were bought off from the polls by the democrats.
Q. Do you know anything about any being bought off?
A. I saw them giving boots to men with my own eyes.
Q. Where was that?
A. That was in Huntsville.
Q. Do you know what they gave them the boots for?
A. To vote the democratic ticket, I suppose.

Also Robert Ford, witness at Montgomery, Alabama:

Question. In your dealings here, would you not rather work with your old masters or those with whom you lived in early days; and would you not rather trust them than any other class of people; and do they not treat you kindly?
Answer. No, sir.
Q. What have they done to mistreat you?
A. The white people held me in slavery.
Q. I mean since that time.
A. Since that time it has been almost the same.
Q. Did you not within the last year find the white people treat you kindly?
A. No, sir; they have not treated me as they ought to, because I have done considerable for them, and they don't respect me any more than if I were a dog, in a great many things, and in a great many things they do.
Q. Do you expect to associate with them, and move with them in society?
A. All I want them to do is to pay me for my lab or and whatsoever I earn, whether it be little or much.
Q. Do you want them to pay you for the work you performed while you were a slave?
A. No, sir; but for work that I now do.

ALLEN ALEXANDER (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name, age, and residence.
Answer. My name is Allen Alexander. I am thirty-three years of age, and I reside in Mobile.
Q. State whether you were in this town during the last political campaign, and at the election.
A. I was.
Q. State what occurred here on election day within your sight and hearing which was calculated to disturb the peace, and prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage.
A. I was on the street all day, from day-break until I was put in jail. At the seventh ward particularly, the democrats were crowding and challenging the colored men. They commenced that early in the morning, at the opening of the polls, arresting the colored men and taking them to jail. For instance, if a colored man came up to vote, some democrat would say he has voted, or he don't live here, or something of that sort; and the democrats had stationed at each polling place a justice of the peace, who had established an office near by. At the court-house there was an office inside. At the seventh ward there was one within twenty steps of the voting place. Upon complaint of any democrats, the deputy sheriffs would arrest the man and carry him before this justice of the peace, who would commit the man to jail. And that, as I say, started early in the morning, and was continued at every ward during the day. At the seventh ward two colored men were arrested in that manner on the charge of having voted twice, and the deputy sheriffs were taking them to jail, and the men were shot on the way.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did anything else occur during the campaign calculated to inspire republicans with terror in the exercise of their political rights?
A. Nothing except the speaking. They would boldly threaten, every time they spoke, that they intended to have the election or blood.
Q. Was anything of that kind said in the newspapers, or was it said in speeches?
A. It was said in speeches. They were very bitter. You could hear them every night.
Q. Did that have an effect upon the colored people here to keep them from the polls and to intimidate them?
A. Yes, sir; these threats, together with the acts of violence a few days before the election, had an effect. The members of the different companies of that battalion took all of the guns at night out of the armory.
Q. Where did they take them to?
A. I do not know. They were stolen out. They have an armory here in the city building.
Q. Do they usually keep the arms there?
A. Yes, sir; and near the time of the election they were all taken out. When they go to drill they go there and get them. They were carried off at night at different times.
Q. How was that found out?
A. It slipped out that the guns were missing.
Q. Was the taking done publicly? Did they march there and take them away?
A. O, no, it was done at night. That was found out, as I say, and had the effect of inspiring the colored people with terror.
Q. How many men were kept from voting on election day by these riots and the terror that existed?
A. I do not know. I know that there were between four and five hundred at the seventh ward, which is a large ward. There are some 2,800 votes there.

Notwithstanding these things, the negroes vote the republican ticket and because they do this the hatred against them increases; but they have learned that unless they vote the republican ticket they might as well not vote at all, because for them to vote the democratic ticket in the South at this time would be equivalent to an abandonment of the franchise. It is the boast of democrats in Georgia that negro suffrage there virtually amounts to nothing; that out of 108,000 voters 75,000 of them failed to vote at the late election, and that the remaining 33,000 will be practically disfranchised by poll-taxes before long. Other States no doubt expect to follow the lead of Georgia. The negroes believe that in order to maintain their freedom and political equality and manhood it is their duty to vote with the republicans; and although they may be hated for it; they may be outraged in their legal rights; they may be defrauded in their contracts; they may see the doors of justice practically closed to them; they may feel and realize that their children have not equal chances in the schools with white children; they may experience poverty, hunger, and nakedness, yet amid all these discouragements and drawbacks they patiently wait in earnest hope that the things which are guaranteed to them in the Constitution will be their heritage and legacy at last.

Peyton Finley, receiver of public moneys of the United States at Montgomery, Alabama:

Question. The employment of negroes is largely through contracts, on the plantation?
Answer. Yes, sir; in the majority of cases.
Q. From your knowledge of them do they receive the fruit of their labor in money, or in supplies which are purchased by their employers?
A. By supplies.
Q. They do not get the handling of much money?
A. No, sir. They never did.
Q. In that way very largely the mercantile business of the country is controlled by the land-owners?
A. I think it is.

* * * * * * *

Q. As a rule, are colored schools taught by white democrats or republicans?
A. All that are taught are by republicans; that is, all that I know anything about.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Are they not generally colored republicans?
A. Yes, sir; colored and white.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. State whether the white teachers teaching colored children are republican or democrat.
A. The whites are republicans.
Q. Is there not among the democratic portion of the community a strong feeling against the white persons who teach colored schools?
A. From report there is, but I cannot say of my own knowledge.
Q. Do you know what terms are applied to these white teachers?
A. They are called scalawags or carpet-baggers, as the case may be. If he is a northern man, he is called a carpet-bagger.
Q. Is it not a fact that there are a great many colored children to be educated, and that the democratic whites are unwilling to serve in the capacity of teachers, or refuse to teach; that there are not many colored people capable of teaching; and as a necessity white people from other sections of the country are induced to come for the purpose of teaching the blacks?
A. Really, I cannot say that they did refuse to teach; I do not know that; but I know one thing, that I have never seen any of them teaching; the cause I know not.
Q. If a white man taught colored children, did not that affect him politically?
A. I think it did.

R. T. SMITH, State auditor.

Question. Give your reasons for that opinion, if you have any.
Answer. From the fact that the negroes are a very timid people. The issues here were nearly all on the color line. There were very few white people that were republicans the last campaign. I think there was more excitement here than there had ever been before. They started up the white issue, and the negroes were worse alarmed than I ever saw them, I think. I saw some from that neighborhood, and they said they could not vote unless they were protected. They said they were afraid to vote. They gave it as their opinion that they were treated in that way in order to prevent them from voting—that was their impression.

To show how justice may be administered I introduce the following:

WILLIAMSON A. GLOVER, a witness on the part of the minority, sworn.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. I will be seventy-one the 10th day of next March. I reside at Forkland, Greene County. I am merchandising at present. I am notary public and ex officio justice of the peace.
Q. Was there a judicial investigation into the disturbance that occurred between the colored men and the whites when Robinson was killed?
A. The preliminary examination with regard to the killing of Robinson was before me; and I committed the ten negroes to jail and those that were captured at the affray that morning.
Q. You committed all that had any connection with the killing of Robinson, or that were present?
A. All that we had.
Q. And you committed all that you captured that morning?
A. There were ten altogether.
Q. Was there any investigation to ascertain who killed the negroes?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who did it?
A. There was an investigation before the grand jury afterward, and these men were put in jail as the parties, not centering the thing upon one; but then the evidence will crop out very clearly who killed Robinson.
Q. You are talking now about your side of the case. I ask you whether there has ever been a judicial inquiry before you or any other magistrate to fin out who killed the negroes?
A. I told you there was not anything; an inquiry was made, but we could not find out.
Q. Did you subpœna any witnesses?
A. My dear sir, I was there and I was a witness myself.
Q. My dear sir, you did not hold the court there?
A. I would if they were brought up to me.
Q. But if you were one of the parties, you did not hold the court on the spot?
A. I held the court at Forkland.
Q. Will you please answer my question?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Has there been a judicial investigation before you or any other competent authority to ascertain who killed the negroes?
A. No, sir; how could it be possible when there was twenty-five men in pursuit after negroes that had fired a volley at those twenty-five men and all of them shot—how was it possible to ascertain who killed him?
Q. You were in the party that fired?
A. I was; I didn't fire my gun until I got to the brier thicket.
Q. You were in the party when the negro was killed?
A. I was with the party that killed the negro.

This officer of justice committed the negroes, but was careful that no whites were committed. That a clear idea may be had of this affair I introduce the testimony of another witness, a democrat.

F. M. KIRKSEY, a witness on the part of the minority, sworn.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. My residence is in Eutaw, Greene County; I am in business here in Mobile in winter; I am fifty-seven years old; I am a planter; I have three plantations in Greene county; I am also a commission merchant.

Q. You talked about Forkland; you have no personal knowledge at all of what transpired there?
A. None in the world.
Q. Who were your informants?
A. I talked with Sheriff Steele, of Greene County, with Cole, and I suppose I talked with a dozen men, first and last. I talked with Mr. GLOVER, too.
Q. That meeting at Forkland was not a political meeting?
A. No, sir; the first I heard of it was that it grew out of this bacon affair.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Did the three men who went up there have any warrants to arrest anybody?
A. Yes, sir; I understood so.
Q. Warrants for what?
A. Some depredation; stealing, or something of the kind.
Q. You are speaking from information now?
A. Nothing but information.
Q. I am trying to ascertain some facts; did you hear that there were warrants to arrest anybody in particular?
A. Yes, sir; but I am not familiar with the names of the negroes down there.
Q. Do you know what the warrant was for?
A. No, sir; I won't be positive what it was for.
Q. Do you know who got out the warrant?
A. Mr. Glover, I understood.
Q. Do you know upon whose complaint it was issued?
A. I do not know.
Q. Then these colored people gathered there and resisted this man who came there with his warrant?
A. No, sir; it is all mere rumor as you hear of it. But this is the information I got. They started down there to arrest that negro, not knowing that these parties had reassembled, and went in the night so as to catch them at home. In going down they came in this crowd. They had out their guards, and they hailed them and stopped them, and one of them, Robinson, spoke, and some fellow back gave the order to fire, and as the white men broke and run they shot Robinson in the back of the head.
Q. You do not know whether they showed their warrant?
A. I don't think they had time to show it, as I heard. They did not know who they were.
Q. Was there any firing upon the negroes?
A. No, sir.
Q. On the next morning when they went back there was a larger crowd of white folks?
A. Between thirteen and seventeen, I heard.
Q. Had they any trouble in dispersing the crowd?
A. They had a skirmish.
Q. Did they fire upon them?
A. Both parties were fired upon.
Q. Was anybody injured?
A. One of the negroes was killed, I heard.
Q. You do not know that any others were injured?
A. I heard that two white men were wounded.
Q. Do you know of any negroes being wounded?
A. I don't know.
Q. Was the crowd that came out the next day the posse of the sheriff?
A. No, sir; they came out before the sheriff's posse got there. They were summoned by the justice of the peace.
Q. When the sheriff came out they had dispersed?
A. No, sir; they had a little skirmish. I don't think anybody was hurt.
Q. How many were with the sheriff?
A. Twenty-five or thirty, or maybe forty.
Q. And they drew each other's fire?
A. Yes, sir; both parties fired at a distance of two or three hundred yards. I don't think any damage was done. The colored people broke and took to the swamps.
Q. Was there any arrest there?
A. No, sir.
Q. That meeting was not held for the purpose of intimidating democrats, or to destroy the property of democrats or anybody else, as you heard?
A. No, sir.

It will be observed that Robinson was not shot at the same time the negroes were. The negroes were driven into some swamp, fired upon, one killed, but no investigation.

In the face of this state of society in Alabama, Ex-Governor Thomas H. Watts gives the following remarkable testimony:

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. Are not the people willing and anxious to conduct the affairs of Alabama in a quiet and orderly and peaceful manner?
Answer. I have not the least doubt of it.
Q. Guaranteeing to every man, black or white, equal rights in every sense of the word so far as the rights of franchise are concerned?
A. This is my opinion, and I have so advised.

He was not sure of that, and hence he spoke cautiously. However, he is a good witness, and his democratic interrogator proceeds:

Q. Guaranteeing the right to sue and to be sued and have equal rights in our courts of justice?
A. I have no doubt of it.

No doubt of what? Equal rights or equal justice. The governor did not explain.

But, again:

Q. Is not that the sentiment of the white democrats of Alabama?
A. It is, so far as I know.

That question is a little too broad, and the willing ex-governor does not feel free quite yet to commit his party entirely, and therefore he qualifies. But now comes the main question:

Q. Are not the white democrats of Alabama pledged to promote, advance, and advocate free government and a government which will guarantee equal rights to all men, irrespective of color?
A. There is no doubt of it. The platform of the party contains almost identically that language.

It was well for the ex-governor to say that the party was only pledged. He was careful to say nothing about performance.

The democratic party were pledged to the same thing in 1872, but the democrats have done nothing toward guaranteeing equal rights to all men irrespective of color. No, indeed; not they.

The ex-governor stated in his testimony that he had prepared the address of the democratic executive committee on the 26th of August last. It is to be presumed that this address reflected his political sentiments as well as of his party.

For the purpose of contrasting the testimony of this witness with his address I introduce the following from the address:

4. The question of white or black supremacy in this State towers up giant-like in this canvass, despite all the efforts of a portion of the republican party to disguise, deny, or ignore it. The odious civil-rights bill, with its Pandora box of ills, insults, and injuries to the people of the South is a vital issue in the campaign and cannot be blinked or put aside.

Contrast this with the following from the national democratic platform of 1872:

Whereas it is essential that to just government we recognize the equality of men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political; and it being the proper object of legislation to enact great fundamental principles into laws: Therefore.

And the following resolutions of the democratic convention of Lee County, Alabama, June 28, 1874:

Whereas the radical party, with a devilish purpose in its unnatural and infamous teachings, has persistently urged and pressed upon the white people of the South social equality with the blacks; and whereas these infamous and diabolical teachings of the radical party are culminating in legislation, as exhibited in the passage of the so-called civil-rights bill by the said party in the Senate of the United States and the unqualified indorsement of the same by the radical members of the House of Representatives, attempting by the strong arm of law to enforce upon the white people of the South social and moral infamy and degradation, whose gift of God is intelligence, purity, and virtue, and whose heritage is the bright sunny South:
Resolved, That all persons, whether white or black, who are the least in sympathy with the so-called civil-rights bill, or who shall in anywise lend aid to those who indorse or countenance said bill, shall be regarded by the white men of Lee as the political and social enemies of the white race.
Resolved, That nothing is left to the white man's party but social ostracism of all those who act, sympathize, or side with the negro party, or who support or advocate the odious, unjust, and unreasonable measure known as the civil-rights bill; and that from henceforth we will hold all such persons as the enemies of our race, and will not in the future have intercourse with them in any of the social relations of life.
These are the sentiments of the democrats and conservatives of Pike County, with their fifteen hundred white majority.

Now, see how well democratic negroes were treated and rewarded. It makes all the difference in the world whether a negro is a democrat or republican, so far as his civil rights are concerned. H. A. Campbell, a colored democrat, and now an office-holder under Governor Houston, testifies:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. You addressed white democratic meetings and traveled with white democratic speakers?
Answer. Yes, sir; on some occasions, not on all.
Q. Did you eat at the same table with white democratic speakers at the hotel?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were the hotels kept by democrats?
A. Yes, sir; you might term them hotels. But in the country they had houses where they had something to eat, saloons and private houses.
* * * * * * *
Q. You said private houses a moment ago?
A. At Wilson's Station I ate with Colonel Blakie. Wilson's is one house fifteen miles from Montgomery.
Q. Is Wilson a white democrat?
Q. I couldn't tell his politics. I was with democrats there, and Mr. Blakie is a democrat, and Colonel Titcomb is a democrat.
Q. Did you ride in carriages with them?
A. Yes, sir; in buggies.
Q. Did you travel in any cars when you were traveling?
A. I went to Fitzpatrick's in the car that I wanted to go in, and nobody disturbed me.
* * * * * * *
Q. You were permitted to travel in a first-class car when traveling about?
A. I paid my fare and nobody bothered me.
DENNIS CROSS, (colored,) a witness on the part of the minority, sworn.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. I am twenty-nine years old. I have lived in Montgomery five years. I was raised in this county. I am now a servant at the capitol.
* * * * * *

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. You were one of the democratic speakers, were you?
A. I was, in the county.
Q. Did they let you speak at white meetings?
A. Yes, sir; of course.
* * * * * * *
Q. What other colored men were democratic canvassers?
A. Here was Cæsar Shorter; he addressed meetings; and Pike Walker, and John Kirkland, and Jack Sprivey.
Q. The white democrats said that your speeches were good?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And they were very much edified by them?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How much did they pay you?
WITNESS. What for; to speak?
Q. How much did they pay you for going about the county?
A. They supported us and our families while we were out.
* * * * * * *
Q. You have got an office now?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do they call you a carpet-bagger?
A. They better not.
Q. Or a scalawag?
A. I aint either one.
Q. While you were instructing the democrats, did they allow the colored children to be instructed? Did they furnish teachers?
A. They did not do anything of the kind.
Q. Do you know of any democrat, white man, that is teaching a colored school?
A. No, sir.

That this man was a sound democrat the following must be convincing:

Question. Do you like these people that kept your race in slavery?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. You like the men that kept your race in slavery?
A. Yes, sir; I was my master's property; he paid money for me, and he didn't bring me down here; other nations brought me down here and made money out of me, and I would have bought, too, if I had been white.
Q. You prefer to be in slavery and have your race there?
A. If I had been my boss I would have preferred to own them.
Q. Do you like the people who kept your race in slavery better than those who freed you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The Government, then, that freed you you think made a mistake?
A. I don't know.

Jacob Stringer, colored democratic witness:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. You do not ride in first-class cars and sit at first-class tables?
Answer. No, sir; not unless it is a black man's table.
Q. Do you not think your money is as good as mine?
A. Yes; but I want to sit with my color.
Q. Suppose there were no people of your color on the cars, would you then want to ride on first-class cars if you paid as much money as I do?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. If you paid for a dinner and there was no colored man to eat with, would you eat with a white man?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you not think a colored man's money is as good as a white man's?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And ought he not to get as good a ride for it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And eat at as good a table?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. That is what they say about the civil-rights bill?
A. Yes; but I do not believe in mixing them together.
Q. There has been a great deal of mixing here, has there not?
A. Yes, sir.

LEWIS NEIL, (colored,) a witness on the part of the minority, sworn.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. What is your age?
Answer. Twenty-four years.
Q. You have an idea that when the democratic party comes into power the colored man will get into office?
A. Yes, sir; I believe if the democrats get into power and black men are capable of holding office, I believe they will let him have it, if he gets elected?
Q. You believe that the democratic white people will vote for the colored people?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have not the democrats promised that they would vote for him and put him in office?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know of this being done?
A. No, sir; none that have run have carried the county this fall; the democrats say there aint any democratic black men capable of running.
Q. For any office?
A. No, sir.
Q. You think in that way the colored people will be better, the democrats will give them office?
A. Yes, sir; I believe if they are capable of keeping an office they will give it to them as much so as a white man.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You say that one of the reasons why you left the radical party is on account of the civil-rights bill?
A. Yes; it is. I do not want that bill passed.
Q. It is not passed yet; don't you know?
A. They said they were going to pass it if they got elected. If I go and get on a first-class car you would not like to see me sit by the side of your daughter.
Q. They do it up North; they sit in the cars with a colored man, and ride with him.
A. I sit by the side of your daughter? No, sir. You can't make me believe that.
Q. Ought not you to ride in as good a car?
A. Yes, sir; that is all so. But that is not the thing; me sit by the side of your daughter! May be some young gentleman who was courting your daughter would come along and see a big, black nigger like me sitting there—he would knock me over.
Q. That is your idea of the civil-rights bill?
A. That is what they said?
Q. And that is the reason you opposed the republican ticket, because they said that was to be the effect of the civil-rights bill?
A. That is what they said; that is one of the reasons. There is a lot of reasons. I cannot tell you all the reasons. I don't like the party. They said that I would have to go to a hotel and sit up before you. I could not sit at that table and eat before you; but let them all be blacks, I might eat. But I could not eat if you were to put me alongside of a white lady. A heap of them would get killed.
Q. You think a colored man is as good as a white man?
A. Yes, sir; I think he is as good as any white man.
Q. You think that a colored man ought to have just as much right?
A. Yes, sir; every man to his own notion.
Q. Does that change the color, if you have as much right as I have?
A. I have just as much right as you have, in law or anywhere else, but you must let me sit by the side of my color.
Q. If the civil-rights bill passes, they do not compel you to sit by anybody but your color.
A. They said so. I don't know. I don't like that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You are not aware that in the capital of this nation, at Washington, colored men ride in the same cars with white ladies, and sit alongside of them?
A. No, sir; I have heard them speak of that.
Q. Do you believe it?
A. No, sir; I do not believe it.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. You are a little doubtful, are you no
A. Yes, sir; I am doubtful.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. The idea of the colored people down South, as they get it from the South, from both sides in politics, as to the effects of the civil-rights bill, is that it is to make the blacks and whites socially equal, is it not?
A. I do not know, sir, how it would be.
Q. I asked you what the idea is among the people here?
A. The way the people here said, is that the civil-rights bill makes me sit up at the table by the side of white ladies and in the cars. I asked a heap of them, and they told me.
Q. To make the negroes equal with the whites, socially as well as every other way?
A. That is what they said.

It is clear that there is no such thing as meeting out equal justice to all classes of society in the South under the existence of the present state of feeling. Declarations and promises of equal rights and justice are mere glittering generalities. It is idle to say that the negro can freely and without molestation enjoy his constitutional right; and until he can there will be no peace in the South unless we give up the contest for human rights there.

It is impossible for the negro to be secure in his political rights or to have a fair chance in the courts when leading men, democrats like Judge Brooks, of Selma, entertain sentiments like the following:

WILLIAM M. BROOKS, of Selma, Alabama.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. You state that the jury that tried Thomas was a corrupt jury?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was on that jury?
A. Twelve negroes.
Q. Is the fact that they were negroes evidence that they were corrupt?
A. Prima facie it is. I could not mention their names now.
Q. That is your deliberate judgment, that a negro being a juror is prima facie evidence of his being corrupt?
A. His being a negro, whether juror or not, is prima facie evidence that he is corrupt.
Q. The fact that he is a black man is the evidence that makes him corrupt, in your judgment?
A. Let me show you. We look, as a general thing—I should say I—I look upon all negroes as prima facie corrupt.
Q. Hereditarily so; a race weakness, is it?
A. They commence at a very early age, I suppose. Such is the fact here. I was born in a slave country and have owned slaves. Prima facie they are corrupt. Honesty is the exception.

The following testimony of Isaac Heymon shows the practical working of courts as applied to negroes:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. Is it not a fact that the unsupported oath of a negro against one of a white man, as a rule, defeats the negro's claim?
Answer. O, certainly. If a negro had a case in court, and the witness against him was a white man, the chances would be entirely in favor of the white man.
Q. That results from the color line?
A. Of course; nothing else in the world.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Have you ever known of such cases in this county? If so, please state an instance.
A. I cannot name an instance, because I never go to a justice's court to hear any testimony given.
Q. You then give your opinion that a court will not do justice to a colored man, simply because he is a colored man?
A. I state that the testimony of a white man outweighs that of a colored man before a justice's court in Alabama.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Is that an invariable rule, simply because a man is white?
A. I think it is, unless he was less respectable, perhaps, than the negro; was known as a reprobate.
Q. Does it not depend on the respectability of the man as to whom you would believe?
A. There is not much respectability attached to a negro, as the courts and juries claim.

Captain E. R. KELLOGG, Eighteenth Infantry, United States Army.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. If there had been a breach of the peace—a riot or disturbance—here on the day of the election, who would have been the sufferers from it mostly; the whites or colored people?
Answer. In my opinion, judging from all past experience and my knowledge in regard to the character of the whites, the negroes would have suffered, and not the whites.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You mean to say in a case of a collison?
A. Yes, sir; I think the white man is much the better fighter.
Q. He is also much better prepared, is he not?
A. Yes, sir; all the whites in this country are always prepared for a fight.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. As a general thing the whites are prepared and the negroes are not?
A. The whites are, almost without exception, always armed; the negroes are not, as a rule. A great many of them, however, of late years, have got into the habit of carrying arms.
Q. Do you mean concealed arms?
A. Yes, sir; pistols, generally.
Q. That results from the sense of insecurity which the state of society has produced?
A. Yes, sir; to a great extent. I think that the negro is gradually learning from the whites to commit deeds of violence.
Q. What is the character of the contract system with the negroes?
A. I have had no experience in that respect since 1870. In 1870 I was on a kind of service where I had occasion to investigate a great many questions of contracts—disputes between negroes and their employers, or those with whom they had contracts—and, judging from my experience that year and from hearsay of other officers, I am inclined to think that at that time and previously there had been great injustice done to the negroes in the South by their employers. I do not mean all of them, but in a great many cases. Practically, I think there was no redress for the negroes in the courts; and I think, from observation since, without having any real experience in investigating the matters, that that is still the case in a great many sections of the country—that the negro, if there is any controversy between him and his employer, is practically without redress.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Taking into consideration the fact that the negro has not the fair play which he ought to have, is not his condition remarkable for observance of law and order?

A. It would be if the negro were a Caucasian; but the negro is more docile and more easily led or controlled. I am not surprised really that the negro has submitted to injuries as quietly as he has, because he was educated to submission when he was a slave, and that education he has not forgotten yet.

I am fully persuaded that if there were no obstacles in the way of negro suffrage, and if white republicans were not ostracised and proscribed in business, there would be no trouble and no violence. I am equally well satisfied that the war which is made upon republicans by democrats retards the development of the Southern States and keeps immigration, capital, mechanical skill, and enterprise away. People will not immigrate and settle in communities where they can have and express but one kind of political sentiments. Such a bigoted policy is making barren the fertile fields and depopulates the cities and towns of the South. No country can long flourish where wrongs and outrages are perpetrated with impunity and where the privileges and immunities of citizens are abridged on account of race, color, or difference of political opinions. That I am not misstating facts, I select from a mass of testimony bearing upon these points taken by the Alabama Committee:

GEORGE H. PATRICK sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State whether or not there is a class of republicans in this State called carpet-baggers and another class called scalawags.
Answer. They are so called by general custom.
Q. State whether those are terms of opprobrium applied to certain republicans.
A. I think they are so intended.
Q. Have you ever had your attention directed to the number of carpet-baggers in this State in any way.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Please state to the committee how carefully you have directed your attention in that direction and what facts you have ascertained?
A. I shall have to state now entirely from memory the number of carpet-baggers or northern men who are residents in the State, and that I think is not over one hundred and fifty.
Q. Have you had means of ascertaining that fact?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How recently did you make a calculation of that kind?
A. During the last two or three years I have had constantly in my office the list of nearly, if not quite, every northern man in the State who has been in the Federal Army.
Q. State, if you know, how many of those men have occupied official positions as State officers since reconstruction.
A. There have been three northern men who have held State offices since reconstruction.
Q. How many northern men have held county offices, so far as you know, since reconstruction?
A. Some twenty-five and perhaps thirty.
Q. State how many of those have been official defaulters.
A. To my knowledge, not one. I mean to say that I have heard of no such default.
Q. Have you had means of knowing the facts in relation to that matter, and have you directed your attention to that matter?
A. I think I have.
Q. What is your business?
A. I am a practicing lawyer, and reside in Montgomery.
Q. Have you heard the charges made against carpet-baggers that they were a set of robbers and thieves and plunderers, and men imposing on the people of the South?
A. I have heard such general charges.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How many other than carpet-baggers have held office in this same length of time in your State?
A. There are some fifteen hundred or more county officers in the State elected by the people every two years.
Q. That would make, since reconstruction, eight years ago, between five thousand and six thousand other than carpet-baggers who have held office?
A. At least that. I am the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and know who the republicans are here.

WILLIAM M. BROOKS, president of secession convention of Alabama, in 1861 sworn.

Question. How many of these are scalawags, as you call them? I understand you to say that southern men who espouse the republican cause are called scalawags.
Answer. That is the common term.
Q. Whether they hold office or not?
A. Whether they hold office or not.
Q. No; I did not ask that. I simply asked whether the southern republicans were not denominated scalawags. That is a term of opprobrium and reproach?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And so understood?
A. So understood and so intended.

* * * * * * *

A. I think those among us who are called scalawags are generally men of very low character. Of course there are exceptions, and this term of reproach is applied to distinguish them, I presume. Of course it may occasionally have some influence upon them, but whether it prevents any man from the free exercise of his judgment or not is what I cannot say. When a man joins the republican party in our midst it has an effect upon his social position. And when he joins that he must feel or realize the fact that he is giving up his social position in a great measure, not altogether so; he feels that the cold shoulder will be turned to him.
Q. How is it in his domestic relations?
A. He is not treated with the same cordiality; the cold shoulder is turned toward him; that is a fact.
Q. Is Judge White denominated one of the scalawags at Selma?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. He is a southern man?
A. He is a southern man.
Q. And a man who has given the best portion of his years to this State?
A. O, yes; he has been living here a long time. I have known him myself upward of thirty years.
Q. Northern men who come into this section of country where you are acquainted are denominated carpet-baggers, irrespective of the fact whether they hold office or not?
A. Yes, sir; if they come in they are usually denominated carpet-baggers. Sometimes when they come and buy land and settle among us they cease to have that term applied to them; it is applied to men who have no local reputation, enter into no business, and who come and go. You know how we talk together; I do not want to use offensive language.
Q. There is a feeling of prejudice against the southern men who are republicans, and against northern men who are republicans, is there not, in the democratic party?
A. Some little feeling and prejudice; not enough, of course, to treat any man impolitely, you know.

By Mr. CANNON:

Question. State whether men, either colored or white, are ostracized on account of their political opinions.
Answer. O, yes, that is almost universally the case. The white republicans and their families are ostracized.
Q. By whom?
A. By democrats. That is done in the churches and in the schools; children, even, are ostracized in the schools.
Q. On account of what?
A. On account of the political views of their parents. A man's wife, for instance, is ostracized in her church on account of the politics of her husband. If a republican undertakes to do business of any sort he is proscribed; that is very generally the case.
Q. Are there any other matters that you are aware of, of your own knowledge, touching affairs in your State?
A. I think I have about covered the whole ground.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Is that ostracism the result of politics or rather the result of a man's being a politician? Suppose a republican comes down into Eufaula, and is a merchant, and attends to his business without interfering specially in politics, is there any ostracism toward him?
A. I have no idea that a republican merchant in Eufaula could do any business.

GEORGE SHARP (colored) sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?
Answer. I am twenty-six years of age. I live now in Troup County, a mile and a quarter out of the city of La Grange, Georgia.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. I left Alabama the last day of August last.
Q. What did you leave the State for?
A. Because the white men were trying to kill me. They shot at me on Saturday evening, the 31st of August. I lay in the woods that night, and Sunday I left, staid at Mr. Cape's house, and Monday morning I went to La Grange. On the Monday before this last I came down and got my family and moved them away.
Q. Are you afraid to go back and live at your old home?
A. Yes, sir. Since I have come back my employer told me there was no danger. Some have told me there was danger. Mrs. Blackmar told me not to stay here, however.
Q. What happened the week or two before you left—what occurred that made you go away?
A. The week before I left we had political meetings. There was a convention at Opelika. I think the democrats had a convention. They said we had a right to have our political meetings and send delegates up here to this convention. We did so. We had our meetings in the night, and they wanted to know what we meant by having them at night. We stated that we did not mean any harm at all, but we hated to meet and lose a day. They told us to have our meetings in the day, and we would have the privilege of running for any office we wanted. We had our meetings then in the day. One Thursday we had a meeting at three o'clock, at Pleasant Hill church. Several white folks were there. Pope Mangum and Mr. Piper were there at the time I was speaking.
Q. Were those democrats or republicans?
A. They were democrats. After I got done speaking the chairman of our meeting asked them if there was any insult spoken on either side, and they said no, that there was nothing said to hurt anybody, and they said that was a very nice speech for a colored man. This occurred on Thursday evening. Our large spiritual meeting was going on at the same time, and my wife's sister got ahead of me to carry her children down. I went, although I did not want to. I did not know that the white folks were making up a meeting to run on us at the valley. After I got down there I found them approaching. Bryant McCullough came to our church and called me out. He asked me what we were up to. I told him, nothing. I asked him why he asked me such a question as that. He said he heard that there was going to be a riot up there that night, and that we were going to kill the white folks. I told him that there was not a gun or pistol on the land. I told him I had one in my pocket, that my life had been threatened, and I had a right to carry it. I told him that there were not thirty men there. He saw that there was not, and said he would go back and tell the men to go home. He told us to have our meeting, and break up in peace and go home. We did so. That was still on Thursday night. When we broke up our meeting, some of the boys at our meeting went down in the valley, and they said there were about five hundred men whose guns were stacked up in the street.
Q. How far is the valley from the church?
A. About three hundred yards, as near as I can get at it. They came back, as I said, and told us that there was a club of white men going to do some harm that night.
Q. Describe the white men; were they armed or mounted?
A. Yes, sir; they were all armed; they were all riding.
Q. Were they disguised, or were they just with their common clothing on?
A. They had their common clothing on. They were drinking whisky, I was told. I did not see that. Our colored people all said they were going home, for the reason that we did not want to have a riot with the white folks. I staid out in the old field with Nathan Griffin and another, to see what devilment they were going to do. They ran down in the valley and began shooting, and then came back and set the church on fire. After it got burning well they came back, and ran up the road crying fire. The church blazed up so that we got out of the field. They were riding in the field to see who of us they could see; that was the reason we left it, the light was so bright. They said if they could run all the radicals out of that country they could live.
Q. Did they say anything else about the radicals?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did they ever make any threats to injure them or kill them?
A. Yes, sir; Wilbur Crawford and Pooch Collins came down to Mr. Terry Collins's grocery, which is in Alabama, near Chambers. It was a country store. I was sitting by the door. He came on and kicked me on the right thigh, and said, "What are you doing here?" I said I came to get Mr. Collins to shoe my horse, and he said, "Yes, God damn you, I am going to kill you for your big talking and speaking." I told him I had not done anything wrong. He then went out in the grocery room to get his whisky, and Charles Ellis came out and told me to get away, that the white men were going to kill me. Pooch Collins had a great big hickory club. Charles Ellis was a black man. I left there, asking him to bring my horse back. I had to leave my horse there and go home. They were going to kill me because Nathan Griffin and myself were delegates to this convention. They did not like that.
Q. How long before the convention was that?

A. That was the week before the convention.
Q. Did you go up to the convention?
A. Yes, sir; I was one of the delegates; this was a county convention; we were to nominate delegates, I think, to go to Montgomery.
Q. Do you know of any other church being burned on the night of the church-burning?
A. Yes, sir; I saw the Ebenezer Valley church set on fire.
Q. Who set that on fire?
A. Wilbur Crawford and Bob Tanksley.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many men? Was there a crowd?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Were they armed?
A. Yes, sir; they had their guns. They were on horseback.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were there any other churches burned that day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How far off were they?
A. There was another church about a mile and a half from Wacoochee Valley, beyond the Wacoochee Valley Creek. I saw the light of it, but I did not see it set on fire.
Q. Was there another one burned?
A. Yes, sir; these two that were burned were colored Methodist churches. The third one was a mile and a half beyond the valley.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Were those churches used for school-houses?
A. Yes, sir; this that was burned at Mechanicsville was a school-house.
Q. Did you ever use these churches for any other meetings besides religious meetings?
A. Yes, sir; we used them for political meetings. They burned them because they wanted to break us up from having our political meetings. They tried to run us off before the election came off; we had no other place to hold our political meetings, and we held them in the churches. They were our own churches; the white folks said it was our privilege to have our meetings, and we held them in our own churches.
Q. Were those frame or log churches?
A. Two of them were frame, and the Wachoochee Valley church was a log church.

When the war ended the people of the North, and especially the republicans, were desirous for peace and for the establishment of harmonious relations between the different sections of the country. They were anxious that southern plantations should bloom with prosperity, and that plenty and abundance should cover the plains and valleys desolated by the rude tread of war; and the republican party stands acquitted before the world of having done aught but acts of generous kindness toward the people who raised their fratricidal and disloyal hands to destroy and dismember the American Republic.

The legislative enactments for the Southern States by republican Congresses fully attest this, and challenge the history of civilization for a more favorable record of clemency and forgiveness. And yet for all this the leading statesmen of the republican party are held up as tyrants and pronounced craven-hearted and cowardly.

Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber forget that many of them hold seats that they had forfeited in their efforts to destroy the Government which to-day lives and has existence among the nations of the earth by virtue of the prowess and valor of republican soldiers and through the wisdom of republican legislators, and that they are living and drawing their pay and subsistence from this "hated Government."

They forget that the republican party had the power to have confiscated the lands of the men who made war upon the Government, and could have compelled them to pay the debts contracted and occasioned by the war. Germany compelled France to pay her war debt before she withdrew all her armed legions from French soil, and the laws of war and of nations justify Germany in this.

The republican party could have disfranchised the men who bore arms against the United States and who aided and abetted them; it could through the military power have organized drum-head court-martials and tried the men who held commissions in the Army and who deserted the flag of their country and took positions in the rebel army the moment war commenced. But none of these things were done, no man was punished for treason; but all were pardoned and freed from disability with but few exceptions, and many of them since have held offices of trust and responsibility under republican forbearance and clemency. The chapter of kindness might be continued, but it is not necessary; the world knows it all and the future historian will be compelled to make faithful record of it. He will say that hundreds of thousands of men were traitors, but not one was punished for treason; that though the land was made crimson with the blood of loyal and true men, that suffering and penury and orphanage and widowhood were forced into thousands of once happy homes, but after the war was ended nobody was punished for bringing this woe, sadness, and desolation upon the land.

The historian will further say that billions and billions of treasure were expended to save the nation of our fathers, yet the taxes for the payment of the war expenses and debts fall as heavily upon the States that were loyal as on those that were disloyal, and that in proportion to the population much the greater portion of the war debt and expenses for maintaining the Government per capita is being levied from the loyal States.

Gentlemen forget, or seek to forget, all this, and arraign the republican party before the bar of public opinion as the great criminal of the age.

Many of the men who fought against the United States, or who were afraid to fight on either side, clamor to-day and cry out, "Away with the republican party; crucify it, crucify it!"

Well, sir; you may drive the republican party out of power; you may turn the government and control of this nation, saved by the republican party, over to the men who sought to destroy it or who sympathized with those who did, but you cannot efface the history of the last fifteen years.

You may dam up Niagara or level the Rocky Mountains, but you cannot make the soldier's widow forget her tears, you cannot make the soldier's orphan forget his father or make him believe that his father did not wear the Union blue and die in a noble cause.
